"Under this section steamboat, express, and other companies claim the right to transport free of charge all letters consigned to them by their patrons. The injustice of this assumption will, it is believed, be made apparent by the following illustration: A and B are rival merchants at the same point. A patronizes the steamer Great Republic, which has also a contract for the transportation of the mails. B patronizes another line. Both merchants desire to send letters by this boat. The letters of B are required to be put in the mails, while those of A are taken charge of by an agent or employé, or some other person on board the boat, and, if not seized by a special agent, are delivered several hours in advance of the letters sent by mail. If seized by an agent, no one can be found who knows anything about the letters, or perchance they are found in the care of the steward, who is merely carrying them without charge or compensation, under section 3992.

"By this means thousands of dollars of revenue are annually lost to the Government.

"Section 2 of the proposed bill is deemed expedient for the following reason: Section 3982 Revised Statutes prohibits the establishment of any private express for the conveyance of letters, &c., while a proviso to the act of March 3, 1879, found at page 356, 20 Statutes at Large, declares that nothing contained in the former act shall be construed as prohibiting any person from receiving and delivering to the nearest post-office or postal car mail matter properly stamped.

"It has always been held by the Department, that under the law the business of carrying first-class mail matter could only be carried on by an officer of the Government appointed and qualified for that purpose; that one of the objects of retaining this monopoly was to secure equal facilities to all the citizens in sending and receiving mail matter. All are taxed alike to support the system, and it is submitted that all should share alike its privileges. Numerous efforts have heretofore been made to provide superior facilities for the dispatch and receipt of mail matter by means of offices and lines established for that purpose, the proprietor proposing for a consideration to receive and mail letters at railroad stations with greater dispatch than can be done through the lawfully established post-office, and to receive letters at the post-office and deliver them more promptly than the delivery can be made through the channel of the postal system. As an instance of this character of business, I might cite the case of what is called and advertised as the 'down-town letter-office' in the city of New York.

"It was held by Attorney-General Black (9 Opinions, 161) that an agreement between a considerable number of citizens, in a city where the free-delivery system was in operation, to employ a special messenger to receive their mail matter at the post-office and deliver to them was in contravention of the law; and the postmaster was directed to refuse to deliver the letters to the messenger.

"It is, of course, perfectly proper for any person to send any member of his family, agent, servant, or employé with and for his mail. When, however, a single individual or company advertises to do this character of business for the public it is perceived at once that a competition with the regularly established and legally authorized postal authorities is contemplated. In other words, it says to the citizen that for three cents you can have a letter mailed at New York and delivered at Washington within a given time; but by employing this rival organization, and the payment of an additional fee or postage, the time can be diminished.

"It is a grave question for the consideration of Congress whether this competition ought to be allowed.

"I have written very hastily in reply to a suggestion from you that you would like to have the views of the Department on the subject of the legislation asked.

"Very respectfully,

"A. A. FREEMAN,
"Assistant Attorney-General, Post-Office Department.

"Hon. J. W. STONE,
"House of Representatives, City."

It is claimed here that it is, in practice, almost impossible to convict persons who violate section 3983 because of the difficulty experienced in fixing the liability of the guilty party, it being necessary to show affirmatively on the part of the Government that the act complained of was done with the knowledge or connivance of the owner, &c. It is thought by your committee and the Department that this difficulty will be met and overcome by the clause in the bill which provides that "when letters or packets are carried on board any such wagon, coach, railroad-car, or steamboat outside of the mails, except as provided in section 3993 of the Revised Statutes, it shall be prima facie evidence that such letters are being carried by the person in command or charge of such wagon, stage-coach, steamboat or railroad-car."

This shifting of the burden of proof of facts, the existence of which are peculiarly within the knowledge of the accused, is not unusual in penal statutes, and is deemed justifiable here. The abuse which this bill seeks to remedy is a grave one, affecting seriously the revenues of the postal service to the amount of thousands of dollars annually. It exists mainly on the steamboats plying on principal rivers.

By proper regulations the person in command or charge of the steamboat or vehicle can prevent this unlawful traffic or business over his line, and can easily meet and rebut the presumption that such prohibited matter is knowingly being carried by him, if such is not the case in fact. The passage of this provision, and the repeal of sections 3977 and 3992 of the Revised Statutes, will greatly benefit the mail service, and make it possible to punish offenses here complained of, by rendering more clear and explicit the law upon this subject. It is difficult now to reconcile these statutes in existing law. Your committee have not deemed it advisable to amend section 3829, as provided in the second section of this bill, and therefore recommend and report the following amendment:

"Strike out section 2, and let section 3 stand as section 2 of the bill."

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules on the subject of the revision of the rules.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules. All general debate having been closed by order of the House, the Clerk will now proceed to read the proposed rules by paragraphs for discussion and amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE I.

DUTIES OF THE SPEAKER.

1. The Speaker shall take the chair on every legislative day precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned at the last sitting, immediately call the members to order, and on the appearance of a quorum cause the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting to be read, having previously examined and approved the same.

2. He shall preserve order and decorum, and in case of disturbance or disorderly conduct in the galleries, or in the lobby, may cause the same to be cleared.

3. He shall have general control, except as provided by rule or law, of the Hall of the House, and the disposal of the unappropriated rooms in that part of the Capitol assigned to the use of the House until further order.

4. He shall sign all acts, addresses, joint resolutions, writs, warrants, and subpœnas of, or issued by order of the House, and decide all questions of order subject to an appeal by any member, on which appeal no member shall speak more than once, unless by permission of the House.

5. He shall rise to put a question, but may state it sitting; and shall put questions in this form, to wit: "As many as are in favor (as the question may be) say Ay;" and after the affirmative voice is expressed, "as many as are opposed say No;" if he doubts, or a division is called for, the House shall divide; those in the affirmative of the question shall first rise from their seats, and then those in the negative; if he still doubts, or a count is required by at least one-fifth of a quorum, he shall name one from each side of the question, to tell the members in the affirmative and negative; which being reported, he shall rise and state the decision.

6. He shall not be required to vote in ordinary legislative proceedings, except in case of a tie, or where his vote, if given with the minority, would make a tie, or will make or prevent a two-thirds vote where such vote is required, or where the House is engaged in voting by ballot; and in all cases of a tie vote the question shall be lost.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to move an amendment to clause 6 of Rule I, which has just been read. I move to strike out the words "in case of a tie, or where his vote if given with the minority would make a tie, or will make or prevent a two-thirds vote where such vote is required, or where the House is engaged in voting by ballot," and insert in lieu thereof the words "when his vote would be decisive." That amendment, if adopted, will dispense with a complicated mass of verbiage, and the clause will then read:

He shall not be required to vote in ordinary legislative proceedings, except when his vote would be decisive, and in all cases of a tie vote the question shall be lost.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] tell me if the purpose of his amendment is not to release the Speaker from voting where the House is engaged in voting by ballot?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am willing to leave that in if it is desirable to require his vote on such occasion.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not see that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut alters in anywise this clause of the report submitted by the Committee on Rules, except to make it somewhat terser, unless it be the object of the gentleman to release the Speaker from voting when voting is being done by ballot. I will say that such was not the conclusion reached by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think my amendment, if adopted, will make the clause very much clearer. I do not desire to relieve the Speaker from voting where there is a ballot, and therefore I will modify my amendment so as to leave that clause in. In that case the rule would read, if amended:

He shall not be required to vote in ordinary legislative proceedings, except when his vote would be decisive, or where the House is engaged in voting by ballot; and in all cases of a tie vote the question shall be lost.

I think that will make the rule very much clearer.

Mr. ACKLEN. I offer as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBSTITUTE FOR CLAUSE 6 OF RULE I.

The Speaker has the right, but shall not be required, to vote in proceedings before the House, except in the case of a tie or where the House is engaged in voting by ballot.

Should the Speaker vote with the minority, and thereby make a tie, the question shall be deemed lost. Should the Speaker vote to make or to prevent a two-thirds vote where such vote is required, the question shall be deemed carried or lost, as the case may be.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is worse than the clause reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ACKLEN. It will be observed that the substitute which I have offered does not change in the least the true intention of the rule as reported from the Committee on Rules. It does strike out the words "ordinary legislative" before the word "proceedings." I see no reason why the words "ordinary legislative" should be included in this rule. I do not think there are any extraordinary proceedings before this House which would absolve the Speaker from the duty of voting under the provisions of this rule.

Nor do I see the need of the word "legislative," because if all the proceedings before this House are legislative proceedings, then clearly that word is superfluous. If they are not all legislative proceedings, then there exists a double necessity for striking out that word in order to prevent any future misconstruction of the rules.

Mr. FRYE. The criticism made by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] only illustrates how easy it is to criticise. For instance, the gentleman says that the words "To vote in ordinary legislative proceedings" are not necessary; yet the very amendment which he offers declares that the Speaker shall have a right to vote. The Speaker has that right in every case coming before the House; therefore the language of the gentleman from Louisiana is open to precisely the same criticism which he applies to the rule reported by the committee.

Mr. ACKLEN. The gentleman misunderstands the amendment as offered. It does not propose to strike out the word "proceedings," but simply the words "ordinary legislative" as being superfluous and calculated to lead perhaps in the future to some misconstruction as to what are "ordinary" proceedings and what are "legislative" proceedings.

Now, we are not framing rules for this House alone, but perhaps for the government of this body in future Congresses. It is therefore necessary for us to make them as clear, as concise, as free from misconstruction as possible. If the gentleman had listened attentively to the reading of the substitute, I do not think he could possibly have objected to it. It does not propose to change in the least the true intention of the rule as reported by the committee, but to obviate any possible misconstruction of that intention.

Mr. FRYE. I only called attention to what was an apparent fact, that after the gentleman insisted, as a criticism upon the report of the committee, that two words in it were unnecessary, the very amendment which he offered proposed to insert six or eight words which were clearly unnecessary; for the Speaker has a constitutional right to vote on every question coming before this House; yet the gentleman in his amendment proposes to affirm that right.

Mr. ACKLEN. Will the gentleman tell me what half dozen unnecessary words are embraced in the proposed substitute; and will he further tell me the necessity for the words "ordinary legislative?"

Mr. FRYE. I have told the gentleman that the words in his amendment declaring that the Speaker shall have a right to vote are entirely unnecessary, because the Constitution gives him that right.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word as to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] That it makes the proposed rule better English I have no doubt; yet I think it is the gentleman's experience—I know it is my own—that a rule cannot be stated to this House too distinctly and clearly. A rule of the House is addressed to all classes of minds. It seems to me that the rule reported by the committee more distinctly sets out each case in which the Speaker may be required to vote than the rule as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Now, in this rule the committee had but one purpose, to provide clearly for the case of a tie vote and the case where a two-thirds vote is required by law or by a rule of the House. It seems to me better to state these two cases in which the Speaker may be required to vote than to leave the matter, as the gentleman from Connecticut proposes, to the determination of the single word "decisive." To be sure, any man in course of time will figure out the significance of this term "decisive;" but if we take the rule as the committee report it, it will not require any figuring at all. The meaning will be clear before every man's face.

Mr. ACKLEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ACKLEN. Will the gentleman now tell me what the committee mean by "ordinary legislative proceedings?"

Mr. FRYE. Precisely what the words express. [Laughter.]

Mr. ACKLEN. Are those words necessary in connection with the right of the Speaker to vote? Are there any proceedings of an extraordinary nature in which he is not allowed to vote?

Mr. FRYE. Well, a vote by ballot would not be regarded as an ordinary proceeding, although a vote by ballot is undoubtedly required in the performance of certain duties devolved upon this House. But it would not be an ordinary proceeding.

Mr. ACKLEN. Is not that provided for in the other part of the rule?

Mr. FRYE. Conceding that these words in the committee's proposition are not necessary, I think the first six words of the gentleman's amendment are clearly unnecessary.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] for the reason that in my judgment the rule as worded in the report is clearly defective, and the amendment will correct the error and make the rule more concise. The rule, as reported by the committee, requires the Speaker to do a thing which is absolutely useless. The clause requiring the Speaker to vote "where his vote if given to the minority would make a tie" really requires him to do in some cases a thing which can have no effect upon the result. His vote if given to the minority can only be of avail where a proposition has prevailed by one majority. Where the proposition is lost by one majority his vote cannot be effective. For instance, suppose on a motion to adjourn the votes stand 100 in the affirmative to 99 in the negative; then, if the Speaker votes with the minority he makes a tie and thereby defeats the motion; but if the affirmative vote be 99 and the negative 100, then, whichever way the Speaker may vote, the result is not changed. If he votes in the negative, there being already a majority on that side, the motion is of course lost; and if he votes in the affirmative the result is a tie, and the motion is still lost.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss a matter upon which there can be no possible material difference in the House. I will say by way of reply to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ACKLEN,] I do not think this committee should accept such a rule as he proposes. It is less definite than the rule submitted by the Committee on Rules, and far more prolix. He travels out of his way to guard the right of the Speaker to vote. That is not needed. Prior to 1803 there was a rule of this House which prohibited the Speaker from voting. In that year, when a very important question was pending before the House which looked to a constitutional amendment regulating the election of President and Vice-President, the then Speaker of the House, Mr. Macon, insisted on his right under the Constitution, although Speaker, yet still a member, to exercise that prerogative and cast his vote, and in the face of the rule his demand was acceded to and he did vote. The Speaker does not need to be guarded in that right as the gentleman proposes in his substitute.

As to the use of the words "ordinary legislative proceedings," which the gentleman has inquired about, they were not incorporated here by the Committee on Rules without consideration, and however faulty this work may prove to be, I think the discussion had will show there is but little if any of it which was not duly considered before it was inserted, even though it may have been improperly introduced. There are proceedings in the House upon which I take it no one would want the Speaker to refrain from voting, as the question of the election of officers or the question of an impeachment trial. These are extraordinary proceedings. They are not ordinary legislative proceedings. Hence the object of the Committee on Rules found its best expression in the very language and phraseology employed.

As to the point made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] I will say but one word. I do not think the proposition of the committee amenable to his criticism. I think it better as it is offered by the Committee on Rules than the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] or the substitute offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ACKLEN.] There might be a test vote on a question where a hundred votes will be given in the affirmative and ninety-nine votes in the negative, to employ the very illustration the gentleman from Michigan has adopted. Now, he complaims that under the proposition of the committee the Speaker, if voting in the affirmative, would not change the result.

The rule as proposed by the committee does not require the Speaker's vote to be given in such case unless it be given to the minority, thereby making a tie, and thereby rejecting a measure which would otherwise be passed.

The gentleman from Michigan, if he were in charge of a bill here, would at least rather have it lost by reason of the operation of parliamentary law than have it rejected by a majority vote of the House. But these matters were all considered, and there is no material difference between the rule as offered and the amendment tendered by the gentleman from Connecticut. I do not think there are advantages to be given by his amendment which are not at least if not more than counterbalanced on the other side. I trust the committee will now vote and dispose of the question.

Mr. ACKLEN's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. HAWLEY's amendment.

Mr. BURROWS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Kentucky a question. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky to state that the rule as reported, and as it stood in our body of rules, requires the Speaker to do that which would not affect the result?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. BURROWS. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky to state that this rule, as it stands, requires the Speaker to vote in all cases where the vote differs only by one, and that in some cases we have, when the proposition is lost, it would not change the result?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Michigan understood me to say that, under the rule as reported by the committee, there may be a case in which the vote given by the Speaker would not change the result so far as the fate of the bill was concerned; for instance, where there is a tie before he votes.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is all.

Mr. BURROWS. Would not that be in all cases where a proposition was lost by a vote of one?

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is the only case, and none other.

Mr. BURROWS. In all such cases?

Mr. BLACKBURN. But I asserted there, in addition to that, that while it did not change the fate of the bill, I apprehended it put the measure before the House and the country in a very different light.

Mr. BURROWS. Then, I ask the gentleman if it is not the policy in legislative proceedings to relieve the Speaker from voting on all propositions except in those cases where his vote would be decisive?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think not.

Mr. BURROWS. I so understand it to be; and clearly this rule as adopted with the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut requires the Speaker to do a thing which has no sanction.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut had better be adopted. I understand this rule to be solely for the Speaker's protection. The theory of our parliamentary rules is that the Speaker should not be required ordinarily to cast his vote. His duties are such it is hardly fair to demand of him the enforcement of the usual rule that a member shall vote, for he is often so much engaged in the ministerial duties of his place that it would be an absolute injury to his work as Speaker to be compelled to cast his vote. But to save the House from a dead-lock in a case where legislation ought to be decided one way or the other it is very proper that he should be required to vote. I do not see that anything is lost by leaving out the two-third clause, as it is left out in terms in the amendment which is pending. I believe it does not essentially change the purpose that the committee had in view in making the report. I am so anxious we should get on that I, for one, am willing it should be adopted.

Mr. BURROWS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. HAWLEY's amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

7. He shall have the right to name any member to perform the duties of the Chair; but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment: Provided, however, That in case of his illness he may make such appointment for a period not exceeding ten days, with the approval of the House at the time the same is made; and in his absence and omission to make such appointment, the House shall proceed to elect a Speaker pro tempore to act during his absence.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to amend this paragraph by inserting after the word "illness," in the third line, the words "or contemplated absence;" so that it will read as follows:

That in case of his illness or contemplated absence, &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think, if my friend will allow me, that he should strike out the word "contemplated" and insert "leave of absence," because the theory of our rules always is that the Speaker's duty is to be here; and he requires leave of absence to go from the House as much as any other member. I think it would be better.

Mr. KEIFER. I am thankful for the suggestion of the gentleman, and to save time I think the language proposed in my amendment is exactly right. It presupposes that the Speaker had leave of absence, had the right to go from the House, and would not contemplate absence without the right or the leave of the House.

Mr. ELAM. Let me ask the gentleman the question, why do you not say when leave of absence has been granted to the Speaker? That is clearer than "contemplated absence." What do you mean by that "contemplated absence?"

Mr. KEIFER. If the Speaker is in his chair, to illustrate, to-day, and he contemplates going away, to-morrow or at the moment he intends to go away to be absent a short period of time, having obtained leave of absence, if you please, I propose to give him by this amendment the right to appoint some member to perform the duties of the Chair in that absence. If he is sick in his chamber at home, he is given by the rule as it is now prepared by the committee the right to name some person to perform the duties of the Chair, not to extend beyond ten days. The same applies to the proposed amendment. I suggest my amendment simply to make it harmonious.

Mr. BAYNE. Suppose he does not go?

Mr. KEIFER. If he does not go, then his appointment falls; that is all.

Mr. FRYE. By the first part of clause 7 it will be seen it is the purpose of the House that the House itself shall elect a Speaker pro tempore in all cases of the absence of the Speaker where it is not beyond one adjournment. That is a right the House has always intended to keep within its jurisdiction—to elect a Speaker where he is absent for more than one day. Now, the gentleman here proposes to give away that right, which the House has always retained to itself, for the ten days, if the Speaker contemplates going off for ten days. It seems to me the old jurisdiction is the right one; if the Speaker himself deliberately determines to leave his chair for ten days, that then the House should have the right to elect a Speaker pro tempore in his absence. If, however, he accidentally happens to be taken sick he may well, not being here himself, appoint somebody to fill his place for a period not exceeding ten days.

Mr. KEIFER. With the approval of the House he does both. I do not see any consistency in the rule as now proposed. In case of sickness the Speaker of the House is authorized to nominate some member to discharge the duties of the Chair; but if he has to go away for two or three or more days, he is not permitted, with the approval of the House, to make such a nomination.

Mr. FRYE. The amendment would simply permit the Speaker an easier mode of going away.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is not in harmony with what has been the custom for the last four or five years?

Mr. FRYE. I do not understand it is. I understand where the Speaker has announced his purpose to be gone for more than one day we have always elected a Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I recall a good many instances where the Speaker has said, "I intend to be absent from the city for the next two or three days, and, with the permission of the House, I will nominate so and so to discharge the duties of the Chair during my absence." I think the present Speaker has been absent in that way on more than one occasion.

Mr. FRYE. If the Speaker has done that he has done it right in the face of the rules of the House, because the rules say distinctly the Speaker's right to nominate a member to perform the duties of the Chair shall not extend beyond an adjournment; and the first clause of this section of the rule is taken substantially from the existing rules:

He shall have the right to name any member to perform the duties of the Chair; but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] accept the suggestion of his colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] as to the phraseology of his amendment? How does it read now?

Mr. KEIFER. If my amendment should be adopted, that portion of the rule would read as follows:

Provided, however, That in case of his illness or contemplated absence, he may make such appointment for a period not exceeding ten days, with the approval of the House, &c.

The question being taken on Mr. KEIFER'S amendment, there were ayes 23.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not call for further count.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. For the convenience of the Clerk, and in order that these proceedings may be accurately reported, the Chair requests members to reduce their amendments to writing and to state at the same time the exact places where the amendments will come in.

The Clerk read the proposed Rule II, as follows:

RULE II.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

There shall be elected by a viva voce vote at the commencement of each Congress, to continue in office until their successors are chosen, a Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, Postmaster, and Chaplain, each of whom shall take an oath for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office to the best of his knowledge and ability, and to keep the secrets of the House, and each shall appoint all of the employés of his department provided for by law.

Mr. CALKINS. I offer the following amendment:

Insert in the fourth line, after the word "oath," the following: "to support the Constitution of the United States."

I think there will be no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. It appears to other gentlemen here as well as myself that there is an omission in this rule, and I propose to amend it by adding the following:

The Speaker shall be chosen by a viva voce vote.

I will withdraw the amendment if the gentleman in charge of the report or any other gentleman can point out to me any provision in these rules for electing the Speaker; that is, for the manner of electing a Speaker. I know the Constitution provides the House shall elect a Speaker. This Rule II is chiefly made up from the old rule No. 10, but it omits the last part of the old rule, which provides for the election of the Speaker by a viva voce vote by the use of this language:

In all cases of election of the House of its officers the vote shall be taken viva voce.

There is nothing of that kind in this Rule II, as I understand it. For a great many years also, as I understand by looking at these rules, it has been provided that the Speaker of the House shall be elected by a viva voce vote; ever since 1839, I believe. Now, if I am not mistaken in my reading of the rules on this subject, there is of course an omission in this new rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman and say that there is no requirement made upon the House in the revision of these rules to elect a Speaker simply because the second section of the first article of the Constitution declares that—

The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

The last rule of this system of rules reported makes these rules the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congresses unless otherwise ordered. The second rule of the proposed revision declares that the officers of the House other than the Speaker shall all be elected by a viva voce vote. Those are the only provisions which touch the question to which the gentleman from Ohio has referred.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky agrees that there is nothing in the rules that regulates the manner of electing a Speaker.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will say to the gentleman it is a matter for the House to determine for itself. The proposed Rule No. II which the gentleman is proposing to amend is actually, as far as his point goes, the existing rule now.

Mr. KEIFER. Not at all.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is for the House to determine how it will elect its Speaker. It is a duty made mandatory by the Constitution that it shall elect the Speaker; but as to the method or manner of electing him it is for the House itself to determine.

Mr. KEIFER. I think it is certainly very clear that the House of Representatives shall choose a Speaker and other officers. That is perfectly clear under the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States. But for forty years we have had a rule in this House regulating the manner of electing the Speaker as well as other officers. I might reply to the gentleman by saying that the same clause of the Constitution of the United States that gives power to the House to elect its Speaker also gives power to the House to elect all its other officers; and yet in this Rule II the committee propose it provides a mode of electing all the other officers of the House save and except the Speaker of the House.

Now, if the gentleman will permit me, and if I am mistaken I will be glad to be corrected, I desire to call his attention again to Rule 10. He will see that a material part of that rule has been omitted—the part stated to have been adopted in 1839, forty years ago.

That is the part that by a sweeping clause at the end of the rule provides that "in all cases of election by the House of its officers," which includes the Speaker and all the other officers, "the vote shall be taken viva voce." There is no such provision in this new rule. Now, if we do not desire in adopting these rules to determine at this time how the Speaker shall be elected, then of course my amendment should be voted down. But it is in exact harmony with a rule which has prevailed for forty years.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have a word to say against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to strike out the last word. The Constitution provides that a Speaker shall be elected by the House. Now, ought it not to be left to each House to determine the mode and manner in which it will elect its Speaker? Ordinarily the practice has been to elect the Speaker by a viva voce vote.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It never has been the case otherwise.

Mr. WRIGHT. It never has been otherwise. Yet there may come an occasion when it would be right and proper for the House to elect its Speaker by ballot. That discretion certainly should be lodged with every House in its election of its presiding officer. Therefore, I object to the proposed amendment.

It is well enough to provide that the subordinate officers shall be elected by a viva voce vote. But I maintain that the House should retain the power of electing its presiding officer either by ballot or by viva voce vote, as the House may determine.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to submit an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

The CHAIRMAN. There is a second amendment already pending, moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WRIGHT,] to strike out the last word.

Mr. BURROWS. Perhaps the gentleman will withdraw that amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I give notice now that in order to expedite action on these rules, and without being discourteous to any one, I shall hereafter object to the withdrawal of any amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment having been moved, it cannot be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will withdraw the pro forma amendment that I offered.

There was no objection, and the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BURROWS. I will suggest, as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] to insert in the third line, after the word "a" and before the word "Clerk," the word "Speaker."

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no objection to that.

Mr. KEIFER. The only doubt I had to inserting the word "Speaker" in that place was that further along in the rules there is a provision made as to the nature and kind of oath to be taken by these officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] is not, strictly speaking, an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] which is to another part of the clause.

Mr. KEIFER. If it shall turn out that my apprehension is unfounded about this matter, then I will withdraw my amendment, and allow the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to be made. But I doubt whether we ought to undertake in this rule to provide the nature of the oath that the Speaker shall take, as provision is already made for that, as I understand it, in the Constitution of the United States. It would look as if we were undertaking by rule——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] is not now in order and not before the committee.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Under this authority to vote viva voce for certain officers of the House, has it not been our custom to include them all in a resolution; the majority offering the resolution of the caucus, and the minority offering a resolution as an amendment to that, thus taking them all in a lump?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not know but that has been so.

Mr. FRYE. Then I wish to ask this——

Mr. KEIFER. That has been because there has been a general acquiescence in that mode.

Mr. FRYE. Does the gentleman mean that we shall be permitted to include the Speaker of the House of Representatives in such a resolution, and vote for them all by resolution?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not mean anything of the kind. That is an arrangement in reference to the other officers, and it is one that does not depend upon the rule at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. It has been by unanimous consent.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, by unanimous consent. What I desire, in no spirit of opposition to these rules, because I am going to vote for them when we get through, for if there are a great many bad things in them they are better than the present rules——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio in offering this amendment to undertake to deny to a newly assembled Congress the right to determine the method of electing its own officers and perfecting its organization?

Mr. KEIFER. I will answer that by saying that in these very rules, which it is proposed shall be adopted, we propose to regulate the action of future Houses in the election of all their officers, save and except the Speaker. And, furthermore, I wish to state that I do not believe these rules will be binding upon future Houses when they meet in any respect, although the committee of which the gentleman seems to be a prominent member has provided in the concluding portion of these rules that they shall be so binding.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman has made the very blunder that I thought he was making, and if he will just let me say one word he will see it. This rule does propose to declare that all the officers of this House except the Speaker shall be elected by viva voce vote. The last rule of this series does propose that these rules shall be the rules of succeeding Congresses—till when? "Until otherwise ordered." Now will any gentleman say that when a new Congress meets it may not go on and elect its Speaker, and then, if it pleases, change all these rules to suit itself? But if you require that the Speaker as well as the subordinate officers of the House shall be elected by viva voce vote, then when a new Congress meets, not being an organized body, it cannot proceed without rules, and it cannot change this rule until the Speaker is elected.

Mr. KEIFER and Mr. REAGAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no proposition before the committee except the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] on which debate is exhausted.

The question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes 37, noes 77.

Mr. KNOTT. I move to amend this rule by striking out, in lines 1 and 2, the words "at the commencement of each Congress." My reason for offering this amendment is simply that this House can only prescribe rules for itself, and the rules which it prescribes for its own government expire when the Congress expires. Whatever rules we may adopt here to-day will have no more force in any succeeding House until affirmatively adopted by that House than a blank piece of paper. The proposition seems to me so self-evident that it cannot be argued. The Constitution provides that "each House may determine the rules of its own proceeding." We have no more authority to prescribe the rules of proceeding for any subsequent Congress than we have to select officers for a subsequent Congress. Our power ceases when our terms expire. We can only make rules for our own government.

Mr. BAKER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] a single question—whether, in point of fact, since 1860, there has not been in our body of rules one providing that the rules should continue from Congress to Congress until otherwise ordered?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer that question.

Mr. KNOTT. My colleague will allow me to answer, as the question has been put to me.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not wish the gentleman to answer out of my time.

Mr. KNOTT. Very well.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If there be any reason for the adoption of the amendment proposed by my colleague, he had better withdraw it and move to strike out the whole of Rule II. If his theory is correct, there would be no propriety or congruity in striking out the words "at the commencement of each Congress," and allowing the remainder of the rule to stand. If no succeeding Congress is to be guided or governed by that or any other rule in this revision, then Rule No. II is worse than useless, because the duty it imposes has been already accomplished by this House in the election of its officers.

Mr. KNOTT. Let me ask my friend and colleague a question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. KNOTT. Suppose our Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, Clerk, and Chaplain, and all other officers, should die or resign?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then there may be a vacancy.

Mr. KNOTT. And then this rule would have effec

Mr. BLACKBURN. But as to primary obligation and duty, there would be nothing left of the rule. For more than three-quarters of a century, whenever a new Congress convenes, a resolution has always been adopted——

Mr. KNOTT. I should like to ask another question. If the rule of this House will bind a future House, where is the necessity of a resolution being adopted; and if such resolutions have been adopted, what then has been the force and virtue of this rule?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Were it not for my colleague's impatience he would have gotten his answer, and much fuller than he seems to comprehend it. I will say, if he will allow me, and I will go back, that for more than three-quarters of a century it was the rule with each new Congress to pass a resolution adopting the rules of the last preceding Congress for its guidance, and declaring them to stand until otherwise ordered. In the Thirty-sixth Congress, however, the present rule was adopted, which declared that the rules of that House should be the rules of succeeding Congresses until otherwise ordered, and from then until now it has there stood.

I did desire to get the House to see that the difference made between the Speaker and the subordinate officers of the House was that, while we propose to require the election of other officers viva voce, we do not that of the Speaker, because the very instant a new Congress elects a Speaker it may that very instant change the rules, but until the Speaker is elected it cannot. It is not an organized body. It has not power to do anything except to organize. Its Clerk has nothing to do except to preserve order and go on with the work of perfecting the organization, which means the election of a Speaker.

Now, do you propose to say that when a Congress that is to succeed this shall convene in this Hall, its Clerk, holding over for the purpose of effecting the organization, with whose services for such purpose you cannot dispense—do you propose to say these rules shall be no guide to him; that the policy pursued for seventy-five years is a blunder; that the rule adopted in the Thirty-sixth Congress, and afterward continued, is a mistake; and he shall have no system of rules for his guidance at all, and you remit him to the common parliamentary law?

Mr. REAGAN. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, stress has been placed by the gentlemen from Kentucky, who has just preceded me, on the fact that a rule in past Congresses has been adopted that these rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives for that and succeeding Congresses, until otherwise ordered. That is in flat contradiction to the provision of the Constitution of the United States. The gentleman then asks: If these rules are inoperative, then under what rules shall we proceed in the organization of the House. He said the parliamentary law should point out the rules we should be governed by, but they are not these rules. It is laid down by Cushing and other writers on parliamentary law that the common law of parliamentary proceedings, recognized generally by parliamentary bodies, constitutes and furnishes the rules which are to guide deliberative assemblies in their organization and in our constitutional government until Congress does adopt rules for its guidance.

I had occasion, sir, to present this question with the authorities during the Forty-fifth Congress. There is a clear distinction. The writers on parliamentary law lay it down that we are not left without rules even if this resolution should not be adopted, but that the common-law parliamentary usage, as applied to parliamentary bodies generally, is to be taken for our guidance and action until the House is organized, or at least until the House as a body has readopted the rules of the preceding House or adopted other rules for its guidance.

Mr. ATHERTON. I should like to ask a question. By what authority does the Clerk proceed in the organization of this House?

Mr. REAGAN. Under the very authority which I have referred to—under the common law of parliamentary usage as laid down by the writers on parliamentary law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN'S pro forma amendment was rejected.

Mr. KNOTT'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. HORR. I move to amend this rule by inserting after the word "chosen," in the second line, the words "and qualified." An occasion might arise when the person elected to fill the office would not be here, and some provision ought to be made for such a contingency.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no objection to that amendment. It is already provided, though, that the officers shall take the oath upon their election, and if the gentleman will look immediately after the words to which he has referred in this rule, he will see that they are required to take an oath, and a very elaborate oath; which has been enlarged upon by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, not only to discharge his duties faithfully to the best of his ability, but to support the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. That applies to officers already in office.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think the rule covers the case, but I have no objection.

Mr. HORR's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. URNER. I move to amend the same rule by inserting the words "except the Chaplain" after the word "whom" in the fourth line, so that the rule shall read:

There shall be elected, &c., a Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, Postmaster, and Chaplain, each of whom, except the Chaplain, shall take an oath for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office, &c.

My reasons for offering this amendment are these: The Chaplain has no duty to perform except to open the sessions of the House with prayer. He has no duty to perform but to pray. Now it is proposed to administer to him an oath that he will truly and faithfully perform that duty. I understand this House, by the selection of a man for the position of Chaplain, expresses its confidence in the sincerity of his vows taken at a higher altar than the bar of this House. Besides, sir, the old rules did not require it, and I am informed it has not been the practice heretofore to administer this oath to the Chaplain. I do not think the taking of the oath to "truly and faithfully" discharge the duties of his spiritual office either necessary or proper.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland a question.

Mr. URNER. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Answering the gentleman's question very seriously; it is necessary that that officer, like all of the other officers of the House, should be sworn to the performance of his duty in order to enable him to draw his salary. During the last Congress a special act had to be passed in order to enable the Chaplain to draw his salary in consequence of his having failed to take an oath.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I think it well that the Chaplain should be required to take the oath as well as others. I think it is not well to trust ministers any further than other men.

Mr. LADD. If the Chaplain came from Maine it would be necessary that he should be sworn. [Laughter.]

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE III.

DUTIES OF THE CLERK.

1. The Clerk shall, pending the election of a Speaker or Speaker pro tempore, preserve order and decorum, and decide all questions of order, subject to appeal by any member.

Mr. BLACKBURN. By the direction of the Committee on Rules, I offer a substitute for that first clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. The Clerk shall, at the commencement of the first session of each Congress, call the members to order and proceed to call the roll of members by States in alphabetical order. And pending the election of a Speaker or, subsequently, of a Speaker pro tempore, preserve order and decorum and decide all questions of order, subject to appeal by any member.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the substitute proposed by striking out the word "subsequently." Occasions may arise where a Speaker pro tempore would be elected by the understanding of the House before the Speaker. Such a case has arisen already twice in the history of Congress, and might again. The object to be effected by the rule as reported by the gentleman is met by striking out the word "subsequently."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure within the last forty years there has not been an instance, I do not think, in which a temporary Speaker was elected before the regular Speaker was chosen; but I have no objection to making the rule so read, by striking out the word "subsequently," as to cover the election of temporary Speaker either before or afterward.

Mr. CONGER. There have been two instances when, by unanimous consent, the duties of Speaker pro tempore have been performed by a member of the House appointed before the Speaker was elected.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and then the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. He shall make and cause to be printed and delivered to each member, or mailed to his address at the commencement of every regular session of Congress, a list of the reports which it is the duty of any officer or Department to make to Congress, referring to the act or resolution and page of the volume of the laws or Journal in which it may be contained, and placing under the name of each officer the list of reports required of him to be made; also make a weekly statement of the resolutions and bills upon the Speaker's table, accompanied with a brief reference to the orders and proceedings of the House upon each and the dates of such orders and proceedings, which statement shall be printed.

3. He shall note all questions of order, with the decisions thereon, the record of which shall be printed as an appendix to the Journal of each session; and complete, as soon after the close of the session as possible, the printing and distribution to Members and Delegates of the Journal of the House, together with an accurate and complete index; retain in the library at his office, for the use of the members and officers of the House, and not to be withdrawn therefrom, two copies of all the books and printed documents deposited there; send, at the end of each session, a printed copy of the Journal thereof to the executive and to each branch of the Legislature of every State and Territory; preserve for and deliver or mail to each Member and Delegate an extra copy, in good binding, of all documents printed by order of either House of the Congress to which he belonged; attest all writs, warrants, and subpœnas issued by order of the House, certify to the passage of all bills and joint resolutions, and make or approve all contracts, bargains, or agreements relative to furnishing any matter or thing, or for the performance of any labor for the House of Representatives, in pursuance of law or order of the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. By direction of the Committee on Rules, I desire to submit an amendment to clause 3 of Rule III, just read, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out the word "and" before the words "make or approve all contracts," and add to the clause the following: "and keep full and accurate accounts of all disbursements out of the contingent fund of the House, keep the stationery accounts of Members and Delegates, and pay them as provided by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to further amend the third clause by inserting after the word "attest" the words "and affix the seal of the House to;" so that it will read:

Attest and affix the seal of the House to all writs, warrants, and subpœnas issued by the order of the House, &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is in the old rule and should be in this.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAPHAM. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] that after the word "regular," in the second line of the second clause of this rule, the words "or extra" should be inserted; so that it will read "at the commencement of every regular or extra session of Congress, a list of the reports," &c. It has been held that statutes speaking of "regular" sessions do not apply to "extra" sessions.

Mr. BLACKBURN. This rule only applies to the list of reports enumerated in the rule.

Mr. LAPHAM. Then I would suggest that the word "regular" be stricken out; so that it will read, "at the commencement of every session of Congress."

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will it be possible for the rule to be complied with by the Clerk at extra sessions of Congress?

Mr. LAPHAM. I think there will be no difficulty.

Mr. BLACKBURN. He has no information as to when the extra session will be called. I speak of it only in its practical bearings.

Mr. LAPHAM. He has the same notice that members have to come here.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure I am not mistaken when I say that at the first or extra session of this Forty-sixth Congress this was not done, simply because it was not possible for the Clerk to do it.

Mr. LAPHAM. I only make the suggestion; I do not insist upon it.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the following:

RULE IV.

DUTIES OF THE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

1. It shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to attend in person the House during its sittings, to maintain order under the direction of the Speaker, and, pending the election of a Speaker or Speaker pro tempore, under the direction of the Clerk; execute the commands of the House, and all processes issued by authority thereof, directed to him by the Speaker; keep the accounts for the pay and mileage of members and delegates, and pay them as provided by law.

2. The symbol of his office shall be the mace, which shall be borne by him while enforcing order on the floor.

3. He shall give bond to the United States, with sureties to be approved by the Speaker, in the sum of $50,000, for the faithful disbursement of all moneys intrusted to him by virtue of his office and the proper discharge of the duties thereof, and no member of Congress shall be approved as such surety.

Mr. NEW. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend clause 3 of Rule IV by striking out all after the word "duties," in line 4, and insert the following:

And trusts imposed on him either by law or by the rules of the House, and for the default and misfeasance of any of his deputies or employés the Sergeant-at-Arms and the sureties on his bond shall be liable; and no member of Congress, officer, or employé of either House shall be approved as such surety.

Mr. NEW. I find upon an examination of the law that the Sergeant-at-Arms is required to make out and return to Congress on the first day of each regular session, and at the expiration of his term of service, a full and complete account of all property belonging to the United States in his possession.

Now, clause 3 of this rule which I propose to amend makes the Sergeant-at-Arms and his sureties liable for the faithful disbursement of all moneys intrusted to him by virtue of his office and the proper discharge of the duties thereof. But the word "trusts" is not a synonym of the word "duties." I take it that with the amendment which I propose the Sergeant-at-Arms would be made more clearly liable for any misappropriation or conversion of property in his possession belonging to the United States.

The next branch of my amendment makes the Sergeant-at-Arms liable upon his bond for the default or misfeasance of his deputies or employés—a rule or principle, as we all know, which is recognized in State legislation, and which has been recognized and followed in Federal legislation. For instance, the clerk of the circuit and district courts of the United States is liable upon his bond for the official conduct of his deputies. Every marshal of the United States courts, before entering on the duties of his office, is required to give bond for the faithful performance of those duties by himself and his deputies. Now, it will be observed that this rule as proposed nowhere declares, even in general terms, that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be liable for the conduct of his deputies or employés. It is unlike Rule V in this regard, as to the Doorkeeper.

The next branch of my amendment is that not only shall members of Congress be excluded as sureties upon the official bond of the Sergeant-at-Arms, but that officers and employés of either House shall not be accepted as such sureties. It seems to me that the very obvious and strong reason why a member of Congress should not be approved as a surety upon the bond of the Sergeant-at-Arms, or other officer of the House, applies with great force to any officer or employé under him.

Mr. FRYE. So far as I am concerned I do not see any objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW;] I am rather inclined to favor it.

Mr. REED. I would like to ask the gentleman if he understands that any rule of this House can make the Sergeant-at-Arms responsible for the acts of his deputies, if he is not already by law so responsible?

Mr. NEW. That is a question I have not examined, but my present opinion is that if he should execute a bond binding himself for his deputies and employés as well as for his own official conduct he would be liable for the official misfeasance of such deputies and employés, although there might be no statute on the subject. If through the abundance of caution it should hereafter be thought best to legislate to that end it can be done.

Mr. REED. It would seem to me as if it was an attempt at legislation on the part of one-half of the legislative power.

Mr. BAKER. It does not seem to me that the proposed amendment to the third clause of Rule IV if adopted will add anything at all to that clause as it now stands. It already provides, so far as the adoption of any rule adopted by this House can provide for it, that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be holden upon his bond for the faithful disbursement of all moneys that come into his hands.

Now, it does not matter whether those moneys shall be disbursed in person by the Sergeant-at-Arms, or whether they shall be disbursed by some employé of his. The obligation that he assumes under this rule is that he will answer for the disbursements of all moneys that come into his hands.

The same observation also applies with reference to the discharge of the duties of his office—all the duties of his office. The obligation of his bond makes him answerable for the proper discharge of all the duties of his office. If he is not able personally to discharge all those duties, by the terms of this rule, so far as the rules can accomplish that purpose, he is made answerable for the default of any employé. It seems to me it would be simply multiplying words, without adding anything to the clearness or the force of the rule as it now stands.

Mr. NEW. I desire——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I will move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW.]

Mr. NEW. I did not hear with entire distinctness the remarks made by my colleague, [Mr. BAKER.] The drift of what he said, however, I believe I gathered. In answer, I wish to say that I believe as a proposition of law that if the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House should execute a bond in conformity with the phraseology of clause 3, as it will be if my amendment should be adopted, he would be clearly liable upon that bond, not only for his own official conduct, but also for the official conduct of his deputies and employés. But it is not at all clear to my mind that the same liability would exist upon a bond such as is required by clause 3 of Rule IV as reported.

Mr. HAYES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. HAYES. Suppose the amendment of the gentleman should be adopted. Would it be binding upon the Sergeant-at-Arms in any court of law in the country?

Mr. NEW. I have already substantially answered that question. I believe the Sergeant-at-Arms would be liable in a court of law upon his bond. He cannot be liable upon his bond so that it would practically result in anything, unless an action would lie against him by the United States upon the bond on account of his official misconduct, or the misconduct of his deputies or employés. The bond would, of course, be executed to the United States, and if he should misappropriate or convert to his own use money in his hands belonging to the United States, he would be liable, on his bond, to the United States, although there should be no statute requiring the making of the bond. This is my opinion, without opportunity to examine the question now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out the last five words of the clause, for the purpose of making a suggestion, which I rose to make at the time the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] obtained the floor and offered his amendment. The sum of my suggestion is that we informally pass over this clause of the rule, let the amendments remain pending, and have printed a letter which I hold in my hand in order that members may all see it, and that the Committee on Rules may have time, as I think they ought to have, to draft an amendment which will cover the case suggested in this letter.

It is a letter which was sent to me some time ago, and but for my absence from the city I should have submitted it to the Committee on Rules as I ought to have done. I ask the indulgence of the committee while I state its substance.

Twice the Treasurer of the United States has in his official report, not only the present Treasurer, but the late Treasurer, suggested that there was an anomaly in our mode of keeping accounts of moneys in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Let me point out that anomaly.

If we should adjourn on the 1st day of June next, before we go from this city each and every member of this House will give to the Sergeant-at-Arms what in fact will be a receipt for five months' pay ahead; really and technically acknowledging that he has received that pay. In the aggregate those receipts for this entire House will amount to about $600,000. The Sergeant-at-Arms therefore will hold in his hands, when we leave here, receipts from Members and Delegates of this House to an aggregate of almost three-fourths of a million of dollars. With those receipts he goes to the Treasury of the United States and draws funds in a lump, large amounts at a time.

Mr. FRYE. Only monthly.

Mr. GARFIELD. Monthly, it is true; but he draws in a lump for all the Members and Delegates of this House for that month. He draws the full amount when not one of us has actually received a dollar.

Now, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House is not a disbursing officer of the United States. He is only our agent, and if he should be robbed of or should make away with the money in his possession, we as members would have no recourse whatever, for the Treasurer of the United States holds our receipts. The only way in the world that we could have any recourse at all would be by getting Congress to appropriate enough money to pay us over again what we already had put into the hands of our agent, and what our agent had either lost or stolen.

The Treasurer says in this letter that this practice has led to innumerable difficulties. Sometimes when this warrant has been drawn and the money paid, it turns out that a member of the House was not entitled to all the amount of the certificate for some reason or other. He tells me in this letter that there are still sums due to the Treasury of the United States for overdrafts in the Thirty-ninth Congress, small amounts which the Treasury has never been able to collect, amounts which members of Congress have overdrawn and have never repaid. The Treasurer in this letter suggests that we might follow the rule adopted in the Senate and make one of our officers—in this case it would be the Sergeant-at-Arms—a disbursing officer of the United States, who would give his bond to the Treasury as other disbursing officers do, and thus would be made directly accountable to the accounting officers of the Treasury rather than be held responsible merely upon a bond gotten up under our own rules.

It occurs to me that in this way we may avoid all the trouble (and the difficulty is a real one) suggested by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. NEW,] and at the same time do away with this rather dangerous and loose way of doing business.

I ask that the letter to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD for the information of members; and I also ask that, with the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana pending, this portion of the rules be informally passed over with the right to return to it when the Committee on Rules shall have examined the question in the light of the facts and shall have presented, perhaps, an amendment which may cover the case in the direction I have suggested.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the practice of which he complains is the execution of receipts in advance by members for their pay for months intervening between the close of one session and the beginning of another?

Mr. GARFIELD. That is a part of what I refer to. But a similar practice exists even while Congress is in session. I presume that two weeks ago the Speaker drew his formal warrant for our pay and that most of us signed receipts in advance for our pay for the current month. The Sergeant-at-Arms presents those receipts to the Treasury of the United States as his vouchers, and upon them draws out $416 for each receipt presented. The money thus drawn out is the money of the member. If the Sergeant-at-Arms should run away with it or should lose it the real loss would be upon us, for he is only our agent; he is not a regular bonded disbursing officer of the Treasury. When an employé of the Treasury or any other Department draws his money he draws it from a regular bonded disbursing officer; and if this officer loses the money before paying it to the employé it is the loss of the Treasury or of the disbursing officer, not of the employé for whom it is drawn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not mean to be understood as objecting to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] or the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW.] My information, however, is that the practice upon which the gentleman from Ohio has been commenting grows out of a provision incorporated in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill at the second session of the Forty-third Congress, upon the motion of Mr. Hale, then a member from Maine. My information is, further, that under the practical working of this arrangement the Sergeant-at-Arms takes these receipts of members for the sake of convenience simply, because during the interval between sessions of Congress the payments cannot be made to members in person. But the money is not drawn upon any receipt until the end of the month to which the receipt applies. Even if so disposed, the Sergeant-at-Arms would not be able to get the money from the Treasury Department until the expiration of each month. So that I do not understand the objection to have any practical force. However, I approve of the suggestion that the letter be printed, and this matter be passed over until fuller information may be had.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman, when he comes to read the letter in print, will see that it embodies a recommendation which has been twice made by the Treasurer in his annual report, for the purpose of remedying a difficulty which has actually been experienced in regard to these settlements, and which may become hereafter more serious than it has been. The Treasurer points out the fact that the Senate has so adjusted this matter that one of its officers—the Secretary, I believe—is made a regular disbursing officer of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It must be done by law.

Mr. GARFIELD. Possibly it is necessary that the provisions be made in the form of a law.

Mr. NEW. If it be the wish or sense of the Committee on Revision of Rules that this amendment be informally passed over, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, I do not object. I wish, however, before we leave the question, to make one further remark. The amendment which I have offered has not been suggested by any complaints or criticisms in reference to the Sergeant-at-Arms, his deputies, or any of his employés, for I have heard nothing of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that this portion of the rules be passed over.

Mr. NEW. I ask that my amendment be printed along with the letter mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done.

The amendment of Mr. NEW is as follows:

Amend clause 3 of Rule IV by striking out all after the word "duties," in line 4, and inserting the following:

"And trusts imposed on him, either by law or by the rules of the House. And for the default or misfeasance of any of his deputies or employés the Sergeant-at-Arms and the sureties of his bond shall be liable. No member of Congress, officer, or employé of either House shall be approved as such surety."

Mr. GARFIELD. Several gentlemen desire to hear the letter to which I have referred; and, as it is not long, I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, January 9, 1880.

SIR: Referring to the report of the Select Committee on Rules, as published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 7th instant, and especially to that paragraph relating to Rule XXVI, as amended and consolidated into paragraph 3 of the proposed Rule IV, increasing the bond of the Sergeant-at-Arms from ten to fifty thousand dollars, I desire to call your attention to a recommendation made by my predecessor in office in regard to the payment of the compensation and mileage of members of the House of Representatives. Such payments are now made upon the certificate of the Speaker (or of the Clerk of the House when there is no Speaker) that the member named is entitled to payment. These certificates, receipted by the member in whose favor they are issued, are presented to the Treasurer by the Sergeant-at-Arms, who receives payment thereof as the agent of the members, and accounting to them as their agent in such manner as they may require. It thus frequently happens that the Sergeant-at-Arms has in his possession large sums belonging to members and to their credit upon his books.

The amount of the Treasury warrant issued each month to reimburse the Treasurer for the payments of the month is charged to him upon the books of the Register, and he obtains credit to offset such charge upon filing with the auditing officer of the Department the Speaker's certificates, if they are found correct. But it has happened at various times that the auditing officer, having found errors in the computation of amounts due to members as expressed in the certificates, has not allowed credit for the full amount paid by the Treasurer, who has been put to considerable trouble to obtain repayment of the money so overpaid, and has not always succeeded in this. For instance, there are at this time held suspended against a late Treasurer, and to his debit on the books of the Register, a small amount arising from overpayment to two members of the Thirty-ninth Congress, the term of which expired in 1867. This suspension has continued to this date, notwithstanding the amounts paid were the amounts certified by the Speaker to be due, and the act of Congress expressly declares that these certificates shall be conclusive upon all the Departments and officers of the Government, the First Comptroller holding that this requirement applies only to certificates drawn in conformity to law.

The law requiring that these certificates be paid out of the public Treasury and passed as public accounts does not require that they shall be paid before being passed by the proper auditing officer; and, but for the delay and inconvenience it might occasion members, the certificates should be submitted to the auditing officer before payment. To avoid such delay and complications in the accounts, the recommendation heretofore made is hereby renewed—that one of the officers of the House of Representatives be designated as a disbursing officer, giving such bond as may be required, in the same manner as the Secretary of the Senate is now charged with the disbursement and mileage of Senators.

I believe that formerly members of the House of Representatives were paid by an officer of the House, but under what circumstances the practice was discontinued I am not informed.

Very respectfully,

JAS. GILFILLAN,
Treasurer United States.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Select Committee on Rules, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I presume it is entirely unnecessary to add, so far as I am concerned and so far as everybody else is concerned, this discussion does not in the slightest degree reflect on the present Sergeant-at-Arms. We are only talking about a general rule of security.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks, by unanimous consent, that the clause under consideration and pending amendments may be passed over with the privilege of returning to them hereafter.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE V.

1. The Doorkeeper shall enforce strictly the rules relating to the privileges of the Hall, and be responsible to the House for the official conduct of his employés.

2. At the commencement and close of each session of Congress he shall take an inventory of all the furniture, books, and other public property in the several committee and other rooms under his charge, report the same to the House, which shall be referred to the Committee of Accounts to ascertain and determine the amount for which he shall be held liable for missing articles.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is a slight inelegance in that rule, and I suggest an amendment which will not change the sense. At the beginning of the fourth line of the second clause insert the word "and," and after the word "which," in the same line, insert the word "report;" so it will read:

At the commencement and close of each session of Congress he shall take an inventory of all the furniture, books, and other public property in the several committee and other rooms under his charge, and report the same to the House, which report shall be referred to the Committee of Accounts to ascertain and determine the amount for which he shall be held liable for missing articles.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I cannot understand the amendment when not in writing.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have the amendment in writing.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is all right.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is a verbal correction, which I think is the result of a mistake of the printer, which ought to be made before we pass upon this clause, in order to make it agree with the description of committees throughout the report. In the fifth line of clause 2 strike out "of" and insert "on;" so it will read: "Committee on Accounts."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. Fifteen minutes before the hour for the meeting of the House each day, he shall see that the floor is cleared of all persons except those privileged to remain, and allow no person to enter the room over the Hall of the House during its sittings.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg leave to trespass again. I think the clauses in that section should be reversed. As it is now it provides that fifteen minutes before the hour of meeting the Doorkeeper shall see that the floor is cleared of all persons, &c., and allow no person to enter the room over the Hall of the House during its sittings. I move to reverse those two clauses, so the rule will read as follows:

3. He shall allow no person to enter the room over the Hall of the House during its sittings; and fifteen minutes before the hour for the meeting of the House each day, he shall see that the floor is cleared of all persons except those privileged to remain.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What is the object of the gentleman in that amendment?

Mr. HAWLEY. I thought it would commend itself to the gentleman on a moment's reflection. It is simply to make it a little more correct and, if you will have it, a little more elegant. If you are going to be absolutely correct in your construction, it would seem to say: fifteen minutes before the House meets, he shall see that the floor is cleared; and, then, that he shall allow no person to enter the room over the Hall of the House during its sittings. The words "fifteen minutes" qualify the whole paragraph, and it should be reversed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. As for the gentleman being an authority on elegance, I have not the slightest disposition to question, but as to the correctness of his conclusion, I must confess I think he has gone off into the hypercritic. I do not believe there is a member of the House who would have put that construction on the rule except the gentleman himself. I do not see the use of the amendment. There is nothing material in it.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to know what is meant by the phrase "over the Hall of the House." Is it up here over our heads? [Cries of "Yes!"] I did not know there was any room up there at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. There came very nearly being a fatal catastrophe by some one going into that hall over the House and stepping on one of these great squares of glass, which burst down through and came nearly killing my friend from Iowa here, and the man who stepped upon it came near coming through after it himself.

Mr. STEELE. Was he eavesdropping? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. He was one of the employés there about the gas. For that reason the rule was made; and every day now, when we are about to meet here, the key of the door to that room is brought down and delivered to the Speaker, who puts it into his little box, and it is kept there until we adjourn, so no similar accident shall occur. We make that a part of the rule for a very proper reason.

Mr. STEELE. A great many of us over here were bursting to know the meaning of "Hall over the House." I have never myself been quite so elevated, thinking this House was the highest point in this part of creation. [Laughter.]

The question recurred on Mr. HAWLEY's amendment. The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 49.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE VI.

The Postmaster shall superintend the post-office kept in the Capitol for the accommodation of Representatives, Delegates, and officers of the House, and be held responsible for the prompt and safe delivery of their mail.

RULE VII.

The Chaplain shall attend at the commencement of each day's sitting of the House and open the same with prayer.

RULE VIII.

OF THE MEMBERS.

1. Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented; and shall vote on each question put, unless, on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll-call and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

2. Pairs shall be announced by the Clerk, after the completion of the second roll-call, from a written list furnished him by members, which list shall be published as a part of the proceedings immediately following the names of those not voting.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I am not instructed by the Committee on Rules to offer an amendment to that clause of Rule VIII, but, under a reservation of right on the part of the members of the Committee on Rules, I have an amendment to submit, and as doubtless there will be several others also offering amendments, and as it will necessarily lead to considerable debate, it now being four o'clock, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BREWER. Before the committee rise, I have an amendment which I desire to offer and have printed, and I hope that the gentleman from Kentucky will not insist upon his motion, so that I may have an opportunity of presenting it for that purpose.

Mr. BLACKBURN. As there are eight or a dozen gentlemen who have amendments which they also desire to offer, I think it better to insist upon the motion that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Rules on the subject of the proposed revision of the rules, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

EULOGIES ON HON. A. M. LAY.

Mr. PHILIPS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the special order for Monday, February 23, at half past one o'clock, shall be the presentation of suitable resolutions on the death of Hon. A. M. LAY, late member of the Forty-sixth Congress, and the expression by the members of the esteem in which his memory is held.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the ground south of the Capitol along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SCALES, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that all papers on the files of the House relating to Indian depredations and other Indian claims be taken therefrom and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs for their use in the investigation of such claims.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 28, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

JAMES G. BLAINE, a Senator from the State of Maine, appeared in his seat to-day.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR CHANDLER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. By the unanimous order of the Senate this day has been set apart for the delivery of eulogies in commemoration of the death of the late Senator from Michigan, ZACHARIAH CHANDLER.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, the time having arrived for the delivery of eulogies upon my late colleague, the announcement in the Senate of his death having already been made, I now offer the following resolutions and move their adoption:

Resolved, That the Senate receive with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Michigan, and for nearly nineteen years a member of this body.

Resolved, That to express some estimate held of his eminent services in a long public career rendered conspicuous by fearless patriotic devotion, the business of the Senate be now suspended, that the associates of the departed Senator may pay fitting tribute to his public and private virtues.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, will the Senate agree to the resolutions?

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously.

Mr. FERRY. I send other resolutions to the desk and ask that they be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the loss the country sustained in the death of Mr. CHANDLER was manifest by expressions of public sorrow throughout the land.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect for the memory of the dead Senator the members of the Senate will wear crape upon the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the resolutions just reported.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, the observance of the Senate this day is in memory of no common man. The sterling qualities of his manhood none ever dare assail. He wore his faults upon his sleeve. Charges of his defamers were frivolous and discreditable to themselves; for of all the great men who have lived and died in this generation, there was no keener seer, no shrewder organizer, no franker partisan, no truer patriot, than ZACHARIAH CHANDLER.

The Chandlers of Bedford, New Hampshire, were well-to-do farmers of the Puritan Mayflower stock. There, in 1813, he was born, and there he passed his childhood, receiving what was then thought a good primary education. As the boy grew up his father gave him his choice, a college training or a thousand dollars to stock a business life. He chose the latter, and, with the spirit of adventure which has always marked the New England race, he made for western wilds.

Michigan at that time was a trackless wilderness, whose solitude lay unbroken save by the roar of surrounding waters. Detroit then was a town on the border, with a population of some five thousand souls. There he stuck his stake and began his mercantile career. His main object in those days was to win commercial success. This he achieved by his self-denial, energy, fidelity, sagacity, and integrity. No man worked harder, lived more frugally, or upheld a higher standard of business morality. Many a night he slept on the floor or counter of his store, and many other nights, through the forest roadway, under the light of the stars, he traversed the peninsula from point to point, doing business by day and pushing his way by night. For several years he thus had been toiling, when the great financial crash of 1837 overtook him. Smaller country merchants could not meet their paper. CHANDLER'S store in Detroit felt the wave of disaster, and, gathering up all available effects, he pushed for New York and laid before his creditors the exact situation, proposing to make to them an assignment of all he had. Their answer was equally creditable to him and to them: "CHANDLER, you are too good a man to be lost for want of confidence; go back and go on with your business, and if you want more goods send on your orders." The result showed they had not misjudged. In a couple of years he had weathered the storm, and paid every debt, dollar for dollar; and from that hour his fortune was assured.

Meanwhile he became most thoroughly identified with his city and State. Generally known as a thorough business man, his acquaintance with the business men of Michigan was better than any one of his associate pioneers. His public spirit led him into all relations with his fellow-citizens which promised to promote the welfare of his adopted home. Then, in his earlier vigor, he took part in the various organizations of the young men of Detroit, and first became known as a speaker in the debating society of the city, attracting special attention by a public lecture on "The Elements of Success." At that time the whigs and democrats were the contending political parties, and Michigan was controlled by the then powerful democratic party, under the distinguished leadership of General Lewis Cass, himself a worthy, honored, and influential resident of Detroit. CHANDLER, as became his New England origin, sided with the whigs. His first decidedly political speech was made in 1848, at Detroit, one evening, upon a box at a corner of the street, in favor of the presidential candidacy of General Zachary Taylor. He began that speech by saying in a sprightly way that one of the reasons he had for supporting his candidate was that his name was "Old Zach," a name he honored, for his name too was "Zach," scarcely dreaming as he said it that thirty years afterward, from the platform of a crowded hall in a great city west of Detroit, on the eve of his death, he himself, as "Old Zach," would be greeted by admiring thousands of his fellow-citizens, assembled to hear the last and ablest speech of his life.

From the election of General Taylor to the Presidency, CHANDLER took a more active part in the local politics of Michigan. In 1851 he was chosen mayor of Detroit, against the powerful influence of his political opponents, through his personal popularity. The next year he was nominated by the whigs for governor of the State; but the time for party change had not then come, and he sustained defeat. Undaunted he bore the taunts of democratic leaders in those days, who contemptuously smiled upon his political aspirations and jeered him with the hint that a mere merchant and business man should never aim so high!!

Controversy in national politics gradually ripened a new order of things. The issues forced upon the people by the repeal of the Missouri compromise and the consequent scenes in Kansas gave birth to a new party, whose history should surpass all others since the foundation of the Government. CHANDLER was one of the fathers and founders of that republican party, and, notwithstanding his pretensions were so derided by his political adversaries, he displaced the honored democratic champion, General Cass, by taking his seat in the Senate of the United States on the 4th of March, 1857.

In a single week after his election to this high place he had retired from an active and large mercantile business, with all its affairs definitely arranged, that private matters should not divert him from his more responsible duties to the people of State and country. When this change of pursuit occurred he was in business capacity the peer of Astors, Stewarts, and Vanderbilts. The secret of success he had found. His wealth, already assured, was so disposed that before his death he was accounted with the country's millionaires. The energy and zeal which had wrought out so large a fortune was now directed to questions of public interest which for years he had seen arising, and had been preparing himself to meet, with a faith as clear as his courage was invincible. Elected to this body, he continued a Senator for three consecutive terms ending March 4, 1875. At the choice for the fourth term he was defeated, when the qualities of the man shone forth as never before. Silent and serene he bided his time. He well knew that the body of the State was with him, and that he had been abandoned by a handful of men who in an hour of fatality were incapable of measuring either him or themselves. Knowing it was unjust, he felt sure that his own State, for which he had labored for years, would on the first occasion right the blundering wrong. She was early to discover and prompt to correct her mistake. Happily, too, that she rejected the example of the Greeks, who persecuted their sages and heroes to death, then afterward repented in monuments and tears. The interval of loss to the State was gain to the nation. The lapse proved auspicious. It was needed to furnish opportunity for his commanding business capacity and Spartan virtue to display on another field. Retiring from the Senate did not long end his public service. The Department of the Interior, one of the most important and complicated branches of the Government, was suffering under the cloud of evil repute. He was invited by President Grant to assume its charge, and, in October, 1875, took the office. Those who knew him well at once predicted that he would clear that Department of long-prevailing scandals, and manage its affairs vigorously, wisely, honestly, and for the best interests of the country. How well he met this expectation the record of his official relation to it will best answer. Upon the inauguration of President Hayes, CHANDLER was superseded and returned to his home in Detroit, ending apparently his official life. For himself he could well then, and honorably, withdraw from all active participation in the political struggles of the day; but the public felt a loss which he alone could repair. On the resignation of Senator Christiancy, by whom he was defeated, he was replaced in the Senate by an overwhelming voice of the Legislature of his State, and at once resumed his seat here, which he held to the close of the late extraordinary session.

To justly take the measure of this man we must recall the times and associates of his labors. CHANDLER first came to his senatorial seat at the called session of March, 1857. He stood up in this Chamber and took the oath of office with HAMLIN, of Maine; Bayard, of Delaware; Bright, of Indiana; Broderick, of California; Sumner, of Massachusetts; Preston King, of New York; Rusk, of Texas; Cameron, of Pennsylvania; Dixon, of Connecticut; Wade, of Ohio; Doolittle, of Wisconsin; Mallory, of Florida; and Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi. That oath was administered by Mason, of Virginia; and faithlessly as some came to regard it, CHANDLER meant every word of it, officially lived it, in his last public words in the presence of assembled thousands, glowed with it, and died with the supreme joy of having through all tests of ambition, fortune, and peril obeyed its obligations faithfully to the end. On taking his seat and casting about him he saw the veterans of the Senate, the venerable fathers and orators of the Republic, and men, too, as he gazed, who even then were preparing for the revolt upon the contingency of an adverse presidential election. He saw Breckinridge, of Kentucky, just then sworn into the office of Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate. He saw here then, as seen now, a democratic majority and the leading spirits of the then policy of that proud party. There were, the venerable Butler, of South Carolina; Slidell and Benjamin, of Louisiana; Toombs, of Georgia; Houston, of Texas; Johnson, of Tennessee; and greatest, if least, Douglas, the giant, of Illinois. And among the master spirits of the policy of the broadest liberty as the true construction of the national charter, were Seward, of New York; Wade, of Ohio; HAMLIN and Fessenden, of Maine; Sumner and Wilson, of Massachusetts; Hale, of New Hampshire; Crittenden, of Kentucky; Collamer and Foot, of Vermont; Broderick, of California; Harlan, of Iowa; Cameron, of Pennsylvania; and Trumbull, of Illinois. Many of these were lawyers and statesmen of ripe experience in these Halls, some of whom had sat with Calhoun and Clay and Webster and Benton, sharing in the debates of those giants of earlier days. CHANDLER, fresh from the counter, had many things to learn; but he was not long in taking his bearings. The whole country was then profoundly agitated. President Buchanan was surrounded by Cass and Cobb, Jacob Thompson, Toucey and Floyd, Brown and Black, and Chief-Justice Taney. Filibuster Walker was maneuvering in southern waters, threatening by his piratical movements to embroil the nation in foreign war; the Kansas conflict was raging with increasing fury, and Abraham Lincoln, then a quiet country lawyer in Illinois, was carefully noting the situation and unconsciously bracing for his herculean labor. CHANDLER lost no opportunity to express concern for manifest disregard for the welfare of the North and West. Observing this early, in placement on committees in the first session of the Thirty-fifth Congress, when committees were announced, he rose and in earnest but dignified remonstrance said, "Sir, we are not satisfied, and we desire to enter our protest against any such formation of the committees as is here proposed;" and, on one of his first measures—a bill to deepen the Saint Clair Flats—said, "I want to see who is friendly to the great Northwest and who is not, for we are about making our last prayer here. * * * After 1860 we shall not be here as beggars." Upon the questions of more general character in the national policy he, with becoming reserve, deferred in debate to more experienced members; but when measures were proposed which he could not indorse, he was of such a mold that he could not sit by in silence. His face was squarely set against the Lecompton constitution and the acquisition of Cuba. His speeches on those projects are among the most telling protests raised in the Senate upon kindred measures. In the fiercer debates which followed, the custom of the duello—popular at the South, but deprecated at the North—received new life. Menace and insult had reached their limit. They were no longer to be borne. CHANDLER, Wade, and Cameron signed a compact to fight on the first provocation. It certainly was a bold step; but it was effectual. CHANDLER and Wade soon had occasion to act upon their purpose. Seward's "irrepressible conflict" drew insult, and CHANDLER took up his cause. Sumner was smitten down and Wade repelled the dastardly act. Whatsoever may be said of the means they employed, the code thenceforth practically came to an end. CHANDLER was as ready with words as with blows. When the John Brown raid at Harper's Ferry was under discussion his allusion to the fury which sealed the fate of those whose zeal for human liberty knew no bounds, was a most biting piece of satire.

If—

Said he—

seventeen men were to attack the city of Detroit in any capacity, and the mayor should appoint as a guard more than seventeen constables to take care of them, the city auditor would decline to audit the account. He would not pay it.

His foresight was even more remarkable than his fearless, patriotic zeal. In the great presidential contest of 1860, when four candidates were before the people and the whole land was kindled to the highest state of excitement, his belief that on the success of Lincoln hinged the life of the nation made him most active and conspicuous in the campaign. He may be said to have been the triumphant knight of that great tournament. When Congress assembled, following this presidential race, he, with others, saw the national heavens black with portent. He watched with anxiety the days of winter unfolding signs of national disintegration, and marked the powers of national self-preservation scattered, and the Chief Magistrate in grave message declaring the Government powerless to prevent separation. In these and other unmistakable signs he read the deep-seated purpose of destroying the Union, and when a peace convention of all the States was called to meet in Washington he could not restrain or disguise his judgment. The cry for "peace" then, and under such indications and preparations, was to him a pretext, the outcome of which was war. He so penned a private letter to the governor of Michigan, which, purloined, was made the subject of mock solemnity of horror by Powell of Kentucky, and the occasion for Richardson of Illinois to taunt him with the authorship of what has come to be known as "CHANDLER'S blood-letting letter." CHANDLER'S reply to these was a manly, frank utterance, and such a scathing arraignment of the scheme of secession and rebellion that the loyal spirit of the country was roused; mock oratory in the Senate for the time put at rest, and this famous letter signalized as the one prophecy of patriotic foresight which the muse of history writes down sadly fulfilled. It was by him then memorably said that peace conventions would prove vain and fruitless. The 4th of March found many seats in this Chamber vacated. Subsequent events developed seven States of the Union organized at Montgomery into a separate government, with Jefferson Davis its president and ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, now a distinguished member of the other House, its vice-president, Fort Sumter invested, fired upon, and war suddenly opened on a generation that had as little practical knowledge of war as belief that arms were to settle what votes had legally expressed as the will of loyal people. The lack of the art and practice of warfare was, however, more than made up by the spirit and enthusiasm for the old flag, which knew no bounds.

Of the few rare men reared and raised into prominent place by an all-wise Providence for the matchless struggle, CHANDLER was one. He had in large measure the very qualities to animate and inspirit a brave and willing, but unmartial people, loving country above peace and life. Such men were needed to quicken and encourage the forces on the field amid the reverses which fell to our Army during the first years of the war. Congress met in December, '61; a great shadow lay on the loyal heart; undismayed, and firm and hopeful midst disaster, CHANDLER was the first to move in this body a committee on the conduct of the war, which was on the part of the Senate, composed of Wade, CHANDLER, and Johnson. And well did it perform its great task. Reports from it fill seven large volumes of the public records. To give a glimpse of the character of its work, and the lamentable national situation calculated to appall the bravest, it seems due at this time to this stout heart that his own words should voice that work and that situation. He said in this Senate, July 16, 1862:

> At an early day of the present session of Congress the Committee on the Conduct of the War was raised. * * * The committee has been in constant, almost daily, communication with the Administration, and has from time to time submitted such information as, in their opinion, should be furnished to the Executive. How valuable this information may have been to the Administration is not for me or the committee to decide, but, in my opinion, when the history of the war shall have been written the country will give credit where credit is due.

The last one of that valiant trio of this body has gone to join his colleagues where just merit is rewarded; and on this occasion and in this presence, one voice at least of that country, shall say that it already gives and will thenceforth "give credit where credit is due." As to the situation, he continued:

> The battle of Bull Run seems to have been the culminating point of the rebellion. Up to that time the North hardly seemed to appreciate the fact that we were in the midst of war; that a gigantic and wicked rebellion was shaking the very foundation-stones of our political institutions; that the rebels meant a bloody, fratricidal war. The firing upon Sumter was considered rather the action of a frenzied mob than the fixed, determined intent to break up and destroy the best Government the world had ever seen. That battle left the enemies of the country masters of the field and virtually besiegers of the capital. From that 21st day of July, 1861, the nations of the earth considered the experiment of republican institutions a failure, or at least an untried experiment. Rebellion had triumphed, and the nations believed the Republic was tottering to its fall. Our securities became valueless outside our borders, and our armies to be raised were considered men in buckram. Not so the brave and loyal millions of the North. They knew that the resources of the North had not been touched, that the battle of Bull Run was but an insignificant skirmish, without results to either side, and forthwith began to put forth their mighty energies. Up to this time the earnestness of this rebellion had not been appreciated by the North.

Later than this painful recapitulation of our then sorry condition, and in the second year of the war, our fortunes proved no better than the first. Repeated disasters not only thinned our ranks and spread distrust of success, but made the enemy bold and defiant. The hearts of the loyal people sank within them. A peace party began to develop in their midst. McClellan, the popular idol of the hour, was at the head of the finest army the world ever saw. Instead of fighting the enemy in the field, peninsula malaria was permitted to decimate that army, which, later, emerged from the seven days' disaster in covering an inglorious defeat. Still an idolized commander, no one dared arraign him—notwithstanding the Union cause was on the brink of ruin—till on the 1st day of July, 1862, ZACHARIAH CHANDLER pronounced his master speech on the conduct of the war, and closed by demanding the removal of McClellan. It fell like a thunderbolt, but it cleared the sky. From that hour hope, and new vigor, stirred the masses of the North.

To speak of his labors during the years of the war—how watchful, useful, tireless, fearless, hopeful, defiant, and active everywhere—would be to reflect upon the memories of our country and households for whose sake he battled in this Senate and elsewhere; visited field and camp; viewed the hospitals; cared for the maimed and dying; cheered and upbore the President and his sorely pressed Cabinet, until victory perched upon the Union banner. Congressional records will reveal the multiplied forms in which his sagacious and practical mind shaped the measures which were so vital during the years of the war, and which now stand as the policy of the Government, and his memorial legacy, bequeathed to a saved and grateful nation.

Of his labors since that period, time will not permit me to speak at length. As chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, and of which he was a member at his death, he imparted to its varied labors that freshness and vigor of thought and breadth of suggestion for which he was ever noted. As in war, so in peace, anything which concerned the honor of, or advanced American interests never escaped his ready attention. Whether at home or abroad, her rights and welfare were to him of the first importance. To the revenue and financial measures which have contributed to restore the nation to a condition of prosperity, and have raised our commercial credit and standing to the front rank with the powers of the globe, he gave the aid of his rare experience and ripest judgment. Occupied with the exhaustive labors that grew out of the attempt to destroy the Union by force of arms; with the care, thought, and legislation demanded to provide adequate organic guarantees to forever remove the source of national division; to assure to slaves made free their rightful citizenship, and utterly extirpate every vestige of electoral disqualification; to retire to the body of the people an army millions strong; to safely reconstruct and restore desolated States; to re-establish civil service upon the basis of preference given to maimed Union soldiers in Government employ; to provide ways and means to meet the cumulative obligations of the nation and place the money of the people upon a safe and stable basis; to prove that under monarchies and not republics "laws are silent in the midst of arms"—since all the functions of popular sovereignty went on with uninterrupted precision—I repeat; with care for all these subjects, Mr. CHANDLER found time and occasion to guard as well against any acts encroaching upon our rights and just relations with nations abroad, as to watch and advance the supremacy of the political party charged with the defense and welfare of the nation at home. He offered and advocated a resolution for reclamation upon Great Britain for the destruction of our shipping by the Anglo-confederate privateers at sea; discussed non-intercourse with England; spoke with indignant fervor upon the raids from Canada; and urged a termination of the reciprocity treaty with that Dominion. He as freely denounced European despotism on this continent and raised his voice against its usurpations. He submitted a resolution of inquiry into the alleged acts of the Mexican imperial government toward the officers and men of the Juarez party, who were reported to have suffered death by order of Maximilian. His speech on this resolution was the bold denunciation of a soul burning with indignation at the intrigues and cruelties by which a hated throne had been set up on republican soil, uttered, too, at a time when our word was thought in Europe to have lost its prestige and power. He said of this imperial intruder:

> If this man, under similar circumstances, had been captured in Austria he would have been whipped to death; France would have put him in a cave and smothered him with smoke; England would have blown him to pieces at the muzzle of her guns. I think Mexico made a mistake. He had forfeited the right to die a soldier's death.

No one, I believe, ever doubted CHANDLER'S courage to be equal to any emergency, public or personal. I can recall but one occasion in my long acquaintance with him when he seemed disheartened and borne down by the force of public events. It was when President Johnson, attempting the removal of the great War Secretary, Stanton; quarreling with the then famous hero of the war, General Grant, and defying the Congress of the United States, escaped impeachment so narrowly. CHANDLER felt that republican government was then at stake and impeachment a necessity. Never was there a time when he came so nigh despairing of the Republic as at that event. He, however, as others, happily learned that a republic that could survive the tragic loss of its beloved martyr President, and live under the misrule of an ignoring accession, has beneath its destiny a Divine grasp which gives assurance of its survival of all human device or human ill.

Men die but the Republic lives. This Senate, as well as the country, will, however, miss Senator CHANDLER. Upon many and varied topics he shared in debate; direct, forceful, and accurate, he spoke with effect. He at times was matched with the foremost of his associates and seldom had to retract or surrender his propositions. His discussions with the classical and accomplished Sumner are striking examples of his accuracy and force in all matters of substantial fact and interest.

In the session of 1874–'75 he was putting forth his ripest powers in support of measures which he thought would tend to the general prosperity, relieve commercial depression, and bring back better times.

When his senatorial term expired his expectation was that the State he had honored and served would mark its approval by his return to the Senate for another term. Changes, however, of a partisan character had occasioned the alienation of many supporters of the republican party in several of the States of the Union. The democratic party had thus gained the ascendency in enough of those States to place the House of Representatives in their hands. Michigan was more or less affected, and some of its old friends had turned away from the republican party in that State, as well. The republican majority in the Legislature was in a measure reduced. Though he received the nomination of his party friends, yet in the elective contest he was defeated, through the fusion of a few members with his political opponents. Never did he carry himself through any struggle with a loftier crest. He scorned to stoop for so glittering a prize.

This defeat did in no wise abate his zeal for the party which had failed to return him to his seat in the Senate. Chosen chairman of the republican national committee, although then filling the place of Secretary of the Interior, he promptly accepted its burden and actively entered upon the presidential campaign of '76. It is needless here to mention the causes which had depressed the ardor of the people and had alienated many from the support of the party in power. CHANDLER, with a trained hand, organized the campaign, and, through all the summer of fear, and doubt, his unquailing spirit directed its movements. When the hearts of others began to fail, he rose in the might of his energy and infused new courage to all around him. At length, when the decisive day had come and gone, and many waited in painful suspense weary days, for the tidings of the result, he, with the first consciousness of the truth, sent forth from the city of New York that ever-memorable dispatch: "Hayes has 185 votes and is elected." And so it proved. Through all the tempest of the electoral count, the clamor, outcry, threats, defiance, fierceness, and bitterness of contending partisans, rank and file, that prophet-sentence brooded in the air; and when the 4th of March arrived the nation joined in the fact, and Rutherford B. Hayes was inaugurated President of the United States, and you, Mr. President, duly installed Vice-President and President of this august body over which you preside with impartial ability.

Placed also at the head of the republican State central committee of Michigan for the fall campaign of '78, the happy result showed that his interest in his own State in no wise flagged. The State did not forget his national and State work. When, by the resignation of Senator Christiancy, a vacancy occurred here, Chandler was chosen by the Legislature with substantial unanimity to fill the place, with manifest gratification on his part, and expressed satisfaction on the part of many of his former associates.

The closing days of the late extraordinary session record another chapter in his remarkable history. The debate on the bill to pension the soldiers of the Mexican war brought Jefferson Davis conspicuously before the Senate. Fervid encomiums were pronounced upon him; till from the gallery floated down and passed among Senators, this waif, "There seems to be no one here that dares call treason by its right name." When CHANDLER read it he quietly remarked, "There will be some one before the debate is closed." At three o'clock in the morning he rose and delivered that philippic which will never cease to be famous in the annals of our national polemics. Nor will any of us ever forget the last time he addressed the Senate. Senators know well, and the country minds well, the purport of his thoughts as in closing he said, "As a Senator of the United States and a citizen of the United States I appeal to the people. It is for those citizens to say who is right and who is wrong."

Congress dispersed and in a few days he went back, as he declared he would, to the people. In several of the States there were approaching elections. Political excitement surged over the whole country. Many prominent men took part in the canvass of States and did efficient work everywhere, but no one was held in greater request than he. It is not now invidious to say it. For the first time a Detroit merchant was summoned to New England to recount the political situation. It was my pleasure to witness his gratification on reading the telegraphic invitation from the scholarly courtesy of the Senator from Massachusetts nearest me. He traveled thousands of miles; spoke during the season at various places in Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, and Wisconsin.

Wending his way homeward, he spoke at Chicago the evening of the night of his death to what the Senator from Illinois near me, who nobly stood by him, has said, was the finest audience ever assembled in that great city of the West on any political occasion, and delivered what history will write, the greatest forensic achievement of his life. He spoke as one already chosen for the shaft of death. His counsel seemed the utterance of a dying father. Never was he more inspired, direct, powerful, and convincing. Of his party he there said:

> The republican party is the only party that ever existed, so far as I have been able to ascertain, which has not one single solitary unfaithful pledge left—not one. The republican party was created with one idea, and that was to preserve our vast territories from the blighting curse of slavery, and we saved them. But we did more than that. We pledged ourselves to save your national life; we saved it. We pledged ourselves to save your national honor, and we saved it. We pledged ourselves to give you a homestead law; we gave it. We pledged ourselves to improve your rivers and harbors, and we did it. We pledged ourselves to build you a Pacific railroad; we built it. And not to weary you, the last pledge we gave was that the very moment we were able we would redeem the obligations of this great Government in the coin of the world; and on the 1st day of January, 1879, we fulfilled the last pledge ever given. Notwithstanding all this they say your mission is ended and that you ought to die.

The multitudinous huzzas that greeted this closing effort of an eventful career made it the proudest moment of his life, when he was never so appreciated, and never so dear to the loyal heart of the American people.

A fitting finale to the sad disclosure of the morning dawn. "CHANDLER dead," as the lightning bore it on the mournful Saturday morning, stirred the soul of this people with the saddest tidings since the assassination of Lincoln. Alone in his chamber, where he had retired for the night, he cast his harness off, and the morning of November 1, 1879, discovered to the nation a loss which sent a thrill and shock as if some monarch of the forest had fallen. The people mourned as for a prince departed.

To have given in any manner a faithful touch of the public career of this earnest man without recalling great landmarks in the progress of the nation, with which he was identified, would be the play of Hamlet with Hamlet's part left out. Simply to characterize him has been my purpose, and to show 'mid what shoals he steered with safety. Words would fail to analyze such a spirit. Acts were the methods of his life, and national struggles must be retold to do even partial justice to one who, with their rise and fall, fought to win. Action was the eloquence of his life. He who is ever disturbed by the recital of the rugged pathway of the Republic, fails to learn that with nations, as with men, mistakes are the steps to success. Those who made them need not spurn the mention of them, for they have occasioned the grandeur of our national growth; those who won by them need but joy over them, for without them slavery with its woe, in the place of liberty with its glory, would to-day be the inheritance of the nation.

What more shall I say of him? He was emphatically a self-made man, shaped on a giant mold; of intense conviction and resistless will; a rough, rudely-cut diamond, unpolished by culture of the schools. In strength massive, in sense surpassing, in mental force subduing, in fidelity steadfast, and in straightforward honesty as transparent as the crystal which from every angle reflects the liquid light. Little did he care for theories. This, all his speeches show. We have learned how he toiled in the early years of his life, and how, when the time came, he wove his own personality into the web of the national fabric. His arguments were living things. His sentences were catapults. He went right to the core of every matter. He dealt with marrow, while bone and flesh were left to their own decay. He was as disinterested in the public service as man well can be.

It cost him time and money to serve his country. He asked nothing in return but a place for service. His aspirations for office were laudable; position he used as a means to an end, and that his country's good. A man of deep feeling, but his impulses always took a practical turn. It was not rose-colored sentiment, but vigorous thought and rugged act that filled the measure of his life.

With all his public labors he never lost his fondness for home. In wife and daughter and grandchildren was garnered unabating devotion. By the frankness of his nature, the ease with which he was approached, and by his broad and ready sympathy, his hold upon his friends and attachment of the masses, gave him hosts of zealous followers.

Floral tokens of admiration and affection were various and plentiful at his funeral rites. Crowning his casket was a characteristic tribute from the custodian of his business interests. It was a tablet of white azaleas, across which, with beautiful violets, was traced "Faithful to the end." The procession to his last resting place was a remarkable scene of devotion. A violent snow-storm prevailed, and yet, from home to grave, the avenues were literally thronged with men and women, defying storm, to pay their mournful tribute to their distinguished dead.

CHANDLER'S memory rests not alone in the measures which have become a part of the policy of the Government, or in the many phases of his active life, but dwells largely in the hearts of his countrymen. Time will best award him his rightful meed. To that just arbiter, as an attached friend and colaborer, I submit his varied career, from which I make NO appeal.

In closing my humble tribute to his fame, I cannot forget to note that he never left a doubt upon the minds of others, wherever he moved, that, however he may have faltered at times and ways himself, he held with reverence and faith that belief which reckons life but the vestibule of immortality. All forms of infidelity he despised. If he did not always practice, he often recognized his highest obligations. A touching instance of this was the sad occasion of his burying a brother in a land of strangers, at dead of night, in the dreariness of rain. As the body of that brother was let into the grave without Christian word of parting, with none to voice a single sentiment of faith or hope, he himself bowed his knees to the earth, and there, in the pitiless storm, offered prayer to Almighty God. He did not forget, but generously befriended the Christian church. Into the secrets of his heart, on that last solemn morning, when alone he met his God, we dare not, and, indeed, we cannot penetrate. Immortal now, he rests with One, who gives supreme value to all that is good in life, and, what is infinitely more, "He doeth all things well."

We have seen the nation mourn as the heroic figures that held sway in trying periods of our history passed to the dust of death—Lincoln and Stanton, Chase, Seward, Sumner, Wade, and Morton, and the thronging procession of valiant captains and men who wrought out the salvation of the Union. Added now to the roll is CHANDLER. All these are borne upon the hearts of a grateful people who delight to honor, but who are powerless to recall. With no murmuring, but rather with hopeful spirit, do we trust steadfastly in that Providence by whose mysterious courses kingdoms and republics rise and fall; and do we reverently speak of that Being whose designs embrace countless myriads of men, by whose almighty will all nations live, and in whose omniscience, the vast future of our beloved land is at this moment folded up.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, this scene and this occasion renew to me the shock which I experienced when the sorrowing wires unladed their burden of grief and told me that CHANDLER was dead. It is difficult to associate ZACHARIAH CHANDLER with the idea of death. His exuberant vitality, his overflowing spirit, his commanding air and presence, all forbid it. I almost look to see his manly and vigorous figure—fit tenement of his manly heart and his vigorous intellect—rise from his accustomed seat, towering above his peers in this Chamber; I almost listen for that voice whose stentorian tones these walls have so often sent back to our ears.

Born and educated in New England, passing the maturity of his years in the West, he united, in an uncommon degree, the qualities and characteristics of each: the shrewdness, the steadiness, the keen observation, the inflexible purpose of the one; the freshness, the eager earnestness, the sturdy robustness of the other; the fidelity, the truthfulness, the manliness of both. His sincerity was beyond question; his honest belief in the principles which he professed was never disputed; he meant what he said, and he said all that he meant. He had no halting opinions; he had a judgment, and a decided judgment, on every question that was presented to him; and although at times he seemed to be hasty of speech, it was the haste of the occasion, not the haste of sudden conviction or of uncontrollable impulse. Those who knew him intimately knew how closely he had studied, how deeply he had thought upon the questions that he discussed with apparent suddenness, and that his impulsiveness of manner followed long and careful examination of the subject under consideration. It was not the rushing of the stream swollen by violent rains, but the letting loose of the imprisoned waters of the lake, which, long collected and confined, waited but the opportunity of outlet to pour forth with more than the impetuosity of the mountain torrent. He was a forcible but not a frequent speaker. The strength of his convictions found expression in the boldness of his utterance. Disdaining the lighter graces of rhetoric, his speeches did not sparkle with wit nor glow with sentiment, but they bristled with facts; if he did not captivate by his style, he compelled assent by his reasoning; and when he had arranged his facts and constructed his argument, his conclusion followed with almost irresistible force.

Devoting himself to commerce and to politics, he attained eminent success in each and secured the highest rewards of both. To enumerate the positions which he filled and the honors that he received would be but to repeat, in feebler phrase, what has been so well said by the Senator who was his colleague. I think I shall do violence to the feelings of no man, and to the friends of no man who survives him in that State, so eminent for its distinguished sons, when I say that he was, by common acceptance, the first citizen of Michigan. The respect and affection in which he was held at home were manifested on the day of his burial. It was a fitting day for that sad office. Detroit was in mourning. From every public building floated the emblems of sorrow, and the doors and windows of numerous private houses were draped in sable. The streets were whitened by the early snow of winter, which fell with blinding fury upon the city. The sidewalks were thronged with thousands upon thousands of men and women, who, unable to get near the house, stood exposed, for hours, to the inclement weather, waiting to see the long and melancholy procession.

To dwell at length upon his qualities as a partisan might offend the proprieties of the occasion, and I forbear. But even the slightest sketch of him would be imperfect without some reference to his partisan character. He was a party man. He held that the division of the people into parties was essential to the balance of elective institutions. He early selected for his support the party that was, in his judgment, most conformable to the spirit of the Constitution, to the rights and liberties of the people, and to the prosperity of the country; and having deliberately made his choice, he adhered to it with all the tenacity of his nature. He believed in strong measures, and had no confidence in half-way methods and expedients. Whatever was right and proper he held was to be promoted by all legal and proper means.

He died as he would have preferred to die—suddenly, painlessly, and with his harness on. He fell as the warrior falls, on the eve of battle, with his sword in his hand and his shield upon his arm. Death was kinder to him than it often is to the race of man, to all of whom "it is appointed once to die." No lingering disease wasted that stalwart form; no protracted suffering enfeebled that masculine intellect. The pale messenger, unheralded and unexpected, summoned him in the vigor of health and of active usefulness; touched him with his wand, and he sank to eternal sleep—no, we believe he rose to eternal life.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the relations I have held with the deceased Senator CHANDLER, have arisen only as a consequence of my service as a member of this body, and it has so happened that by the organization of political parties we usually found ourselves in decided opposition to each other.

Of his political opinions, actions and methods, I will not therefore speak, for I could not do so approvingly, nor would it be worthy of myself or of him to attempt qualification or reconciliation of our decided opinions on policies or principles of government,—in regard to which few men differed so widely as he and I.

It may be adopted as a wise rule in arriving at an estimate of men and their careers, to precede a formation of judgment of an antagonist, by the inquiry, "How would we have regarded the action of our adversary, had his energies been exerted in favor of the party and policies with which we ourselves have been allied?"

May it not well be, that seen thus through a medium of sympathetic ends, the means of attainment, would have appeared somewhat less objectionable?

In the maze of action and passion of daily political life we are not apt to judge men justly, and may easily fail equally to appreciate the faults of an ally and the virtues of an opponent.

But there were traits and qualities in Mr. CHANDLER that all men may dwell upon with admiration and respect, and which I have now a melancholy satisfaction in attesting.

He was manly, impulsive, outspoken, sincere, and generous—an open but not implacable foe, and a steady and courageous friend.

His hand was open, for he was "a cheerful giver." He possessed a mind of superior force and sagacity, and his faculties for the administration of affairs were eminently practical and effective.

In one important respect he supplied an example valuable in any government, and especially in one so popular in its forward nature as our own. I refer to the fact that on no occasion was Mr. CHANDLER known to use his official position for his own pecuniary gain,—directly or indirectly.

His death has ended a long career of public service in executive and legislative capacities, and throughout his hands were ever clean of unjust or illegitimate gain, nor did his bitterest political foe (and no man evoked stronger personal criticism) ever charge, or even suspect him, with making personal profit out of his political station and opportunities.

He was a man of vigorous, frank nature, and his virtues and his faults were the natural outgrowth. Free-handed and open-hearted, he kept his word, despised a coward, and loathed a hypocrite.

Standing now as it were above his newly made grave, I bear willing testimony to these personal virtues, and can recall many instances of his accommodating kindness and personal courtesy, which rendered the transaction of business with him so easy and agreeable.

For the rest, I feel that we are too near the years of his active political career to express positive judgment.

To justly measure so aggressive, vigorous and influential a character as his, it must be viewed at a little distance, as sculptors often ask for the consideration of their strongest and most rugged works.

Time will mellow, and reflection will soften the asperities and animosities caused by recent and heated conflict and which may obscure somewhat present judgment.

Mr. President, the messenger of death came to our departed associate suddenly, and in the very midst of his most ardent and strenuous pursuits.

Here in this hall of public deliberation, once more are we confronted and startled by the foot-prints of the Pale Archer, whose shafts intended surely for each one of us remain as yet in the quiver unselected. Busied as we all are with the thoughts and cares of daily life, should we not pause to-day, and, thinking of the strong man who has been so suddenly called from our side, and from the home and wide circle of friends, to whom his warm heart and manly qualities so endeared him:—glance down the inevitable pathway he has been called upon to tread, and so order our living that each may not fear to follow in his turn?

Mr. HAMLIN. The friendships formed in this body in long association are no inconsiderable compensation for the labors and annoyance incident to senatorial life. While patience and forbearance are sometimes exhausted in earnest, exhaustive, and at times angry debate, and many things are said and done in zeal which the calmer judgment will not approve, yet the ties here formed and cemented will never be severed in life. As a rule these friendships, differing in degree, are far more general than is supposed. The cases are rare and exceptional where association here does not produce a cordial and sincere greeting as we mingle and meet along the pathway of life. And the acquaintance formed here with the deceased distinguished Senator, which ripened into permanent and undisturbed friendship, justifies if it does not require that I should add a few words of personal tribute to his worth and memory in the same spirit with which the friendly hand would place a garland of flowers upon his new-made grave. Some have spoken and others will speak more elaborately of his public life and valuable services.

I first knew of Mr. CHANDLER as a distinguished merchant in the city of Detroit, where he had become eminent for his high commercial and financial integrity, and had established a business reputation which extended far beyond the limits of his own State. In one of those financial tornadoes which at times have disturbed the business and industries of our country, when older and apparently more firmly established houses were wrecked by the blast, so well established was his reputation for unquestioned mercantile capacity and integrity that, when himself in doubt as to his ability to withstand the crisis, on consultation with those with whom he had business relations, and acting under their united advice and assurances of support, he went forward triumphantly and successfully outriding the storm. A merchant of known and unquestioned integrity, he was at all times entitled to receive and did receive the highest consideration. It is indeed a priceless legacy which he has left to his family, and he furnishes an example which should be imitated by all who care to be honest. His sterling character in that regard is the brighter in times like these, when the crime of repudiation stalks at noon-day and finds unblushing advocates among States and corporations as well as among individuals.

I knew of the Senator also as a distinguished leader in the whig party in the days of its strength and its triumph. He was once its honored leader in a gubernatorial contest in his State. I also knew of him well as one of the prominent and leading men in the State of Michigan by whose counsels and under whose guidance the republican party was formed, and those who thought alike were induced to act together; a party in which he was at all times prominent, and to which he adhered with unwavering fidelity to the close of his life; and by which he won that national confidence and respect to which he was so eminently entitled.

But I became personally acquainted with Senator CHANDLER on that day when we were sworn in as members of this body, and at the time when he first took his seat in the Senate of the United States.

In my judgment, the most prominent and distinguishing traits in the character of Senator CHANDLER were his sincere convictions of what he believed to be right, and his indomitable courage in expressing and maintaining those convictions regardless of consequences. He who possesses those characteristics may always have enemies, but he will never be without friends. I have myself but little respect for that man who has not enough of character to make an enemy, for he cannot be worthy to claim others as his friends. The frankness with which Senator CHANDLER expressed his opinions upon all occasions was not acceptable to many, and if he did not thereby incur their hostility he certainly failed to attach them to him as friends. But none were left in doubt as to the position he would occupy upon any question in regard to which his opinions were known. He was a man of convictions and courage; never a man of policy and compromise; nor did he believe in that timidity which in effect was treason to right and justice.

That in his life for which he was perhaps held in the highest esteem by the loyal people of this country was the zeal and courage he displayed and the labor he performed in maintaining the supremacy of the Government. Many there were who talked more; few, if any, who labored as much and as effectively. With him it was always actions rather than words. He had then, as at all times, the boldness to characterize things and events by their right names, however distasteful it might be to others. I would award all honor to the brave men who by their heroic acts and undaunted courage have been so instrumental in advancing the best interests of our common country in the field or on the ocean. I would pluck no leaf from the wreaths that so justly adorn their brows. I yield to none in the respect I would pay to them. But courage, cool, deliberate, unmistakable courage is as requisite and is as certainly displayed in the deliberative councils of the nation as on the field of battle. The highest courage is that which always dares to do the right and fears only to do the wrong. The victories of peace are more important than those of war, and to those who win them the highest homage is due.

> Not to the ensanguined field of death alone
> Is valor limited: she sits serene
> In the deliberative council, sagely scans
> The sources of action, weighs, prevents, provides,
> And scorns to count her glories, from the feats
> Of brutal force alone.

Those of us who were so long associated with the late Senator in this body will miss him exceedingly. In the wisdom of an inscrutable Providence, his seat here has been made vacant. All that was mortal of him now reposes in the soil of his adopted State, which he had honored as the State had honored him. Those who knew him best will mourn him most, while the nation pays homage to his memory for public services so grandly performed.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. CHANDLER sprang from a strong race of men, reared in a State which has shed luster on other Commonwealths by the gift of her native-born and her native-bred. She gave Webster to Massachusetts, Chief-Justice Chase to Ohio, General Dix to New York, and Horace Greeley to the head of American journalism. Mr. CHANDLER left New Hampshire before he attained his majority, and with limited precuniary resources sought a home in the inviting territory of the Northwest. He had great physical strength, with remarkable powers of endurance, possessed energy that could not be overtaxed, was gifted with courage of a high order, was imbued with principles which throughout his life were inflexible, was intelligent and well instructed, and in all respects equipped for a career in the great and splendid region where he lived and grew and strengthened and prospered and died.

For a long period following the second war with Great Britain the Territory of Michigan was governed by one of the most persuasive and successful of American statesmen; whose pure and honorable life, whose grace and kindness of manner, and whose almost unlimited power in what was then a remote frontier Territory, had enabled him to mold the vast majority of the early settlers to his own political views. When Mr. CHANDLER reached Detroit General Cass had left the scene of his long reign—for reign it might well be called—to assume control of the War Department under one of the strongest administrations that ever governed the country. The great majority of young men at twenty years of age naturally drifted with a current that was so strong; but Mr. CHANDLER had inherited certain political principles which were strengthened by his own convictions as he grew to manhood, and he took his stand at once and firmly with the minority. He was from the outset a strong power in the political field; though not until his maturer years, with fortune attained and the harder struggles of life crowned with victory, would he consent to hold any public position. But he was in all the fierce conflicts which raged for twenty years in Michigan, and which ended in changing the political mastery of the State. It is not matter of wonder that personal estrangements occurred in such prolonged and bitter controversy, without indeed the loss of mutual respect, and in one of the most exciting periods of the struggle General Cass spoke publicly of not enjoying the honor of Mr. CHANDLER'S acquaintance. It was just three years afterward, as Mr. CHANDLER delighted to tell with good-natured and pardonable boasting, that he carried to General Cass a letter of introduction from the governor of Michigan which so impressed the General that he caused it to be publicly read in this Chamber and placed on the permanent files of the Senate. It is to the honor of both these great men that complete cordiality of friendship was restored, and that in the hour of supreme peril to the nation which came soon after, General Cass and Mr. CHANDLER stood side by side in maintaining the Union of the States by the exercise of the war power of the Government. They sleep their last sleep in the same beautiful cemetery near the city which was so long their home, under the soil of the State which each did so much to honor, and on the shores of the lakes whose commercial development, spanned by their lives, has been so greatly promoted by their efforts.

The anti-slavery agitation which broke forth with such strength in 1854, following the repeal of the Missouri compromise, met with partial reaction soon after, and in 1856 Mr. Buchanan was chosen to the Presidency. Mr. CHANDLER took his seat for the first time in this body on the day of Mr. Buchanan's inauguration. It was the first public station he had ever held except the mayoralty of Detroit for a single term, and the first for which he had ever been a candidate, except when in 1852 he consented to lead the forlorn hope of the Whigs in the contest for governor of Michigan. When he entered the Senate the democratic party bore undisputed sway in this Chamber, having more than two-thirds of the entire body. The party was led by resolute, aggressive, able, uncompromising men, who played for a high stake and who played the bold game of those who were willing to cast all upon the hazard of the die. The party in opposition, to which Mr. CHANDLER belonged, was weak in numbers but strong in character, intellect, and influence. Seward, with his philosophy of optimism, his deep study into the working of political forces, and his affluence of rhetoric, was its accepted leader. He was upheld and sustained by Sumner, with his wealth of learning and his burning zeal for the right; by Fessenden, less philosophic than Seward, less learned than Sumner, but more logical and skilled o' fence than either; by Wade, who in mettle and make-up was a Cromwellian, who, had he lived in the days of the Commonwealth, would have fearlessly followed the Protector in the expulsion of an illegal parliament, or drawn the sword of the Lord and Gideon to smite hip and thigh the Amalekites who appeared anew in the persons of the cavaliers; by Collamer wise and learned, pure and dignified, a conscript father in look and in fact; by John P. Hale, who never faltered in his devotion to the anti-slavery cause, and who had earlier than any of his associates broken his alliance with the old parties and given his eloquent voice to the cause of the despised Nazarenes; by Trumbull, acute, able, untiring, the first republican Senator from that great State which has since added so much to the grandeur and glory of our history; by HAMLIN, with long training, with devoted fidelity, with undaunted courage, who came anew to the conflict of ideas with a State behind him, with its faith and its force, and who alone of all the illustrious Senate of 1857 is with us to-day; by Cameron, with wide and varied experience in affairs, with consummate tact in the government of parties, whose active political life began in the days of Monroe and who, after a prolonged and stormy career, still survives by reason of strength at fourscore, with the strong attachment of his friends, the respect of his opponents, the hearty good wishes of all.

Into association with these men Mr. CHANDLER entered when in his forty-fourth year. His influence was felt, and felt powerfully, from the first day. A writer at the time said that the effect of CHANDLER'S coming was like the addition of a fresh division of troops to an army engaged in a hand-to-hand conflict with an outnumbering foe. He encouraged, upheld, inspired, coerced others to do things which he could not do himself, but which others could not have done without him. His first four years in the Senate were passed in a hopeless minority, where a sense of common danger had banished rivalry, checked jealousy, toned down ambition, and produced that effective harmony and splendid discipline which won the most signal and far-reaching of all our political victories in the election of Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency. Changed by this triumph and the startling events which followed into a majority party in the Senate, the republicans found many of their oldest and ablest leaders trained only to the duties of the minority, and not fitted to assume with grace and efficiency the task of administrative leadership. They had been so long studying the science of attack that they were awkward when they felt the need and assumed the responsibility of defense. They were like some of the British regiments in the campaign of Namur, of whom William of Orange said there was no fortress of the French could resist them, and none that was safe in their hands.

It was from this period that Mr. CHANDLER became more widely known to the whole country—achieving almost at a single bound what we term a national reputation. His defiant attitude in the presence of the impending and overwhelming danger of war; his superb courage under all the doubts and reverses of that terrible struggle between brethren of the same blood; his readiness to do all things, to dare all things, to endure all things for the sake of victory to the Union; his ardent support of Mr. Lincoln's administration in every war measure which they proposed; his quickness to take issue with the Administration when he thought a great campaign was about to be ruined by what was termed the Fabian policy; his inspiring presence, his burning zeal, his sleepless vigilance, his broad sympathies, his prompt decision, his eager patriotism, his crowning faith in the final result, all combined to give to Mr. CHANDLER a front rank among those honorable and devoted men who in our war history are entitled to stand next to those who led the mighty conflict on the field of battle.

To portray Mr. CHANDLER'S career for the ten consecutive years after the war closed would involve too close a reference to exciting questions still in some sense at issue. But in that long period of service and in the shorter one that immediately preceded his death, those who knew him well could observe a constant intellectual growth. He was fuller and stronger and abler in conference and in debate the last year of his life than ever before. He entered the Senate originally without any practice in parliamentary discussion. He left it one of the most forcible and most fearless antagonists that could be encountered in this Chamber. His methods were learned here. He was plain and yet eloquent; aggressive and yet careful; fearless without showing bravado. What he knew, he knew with precision; the powers he possessed were always at his command and he never declined a challenge to the lists. "Here and now" was his motto, and his entire senatorial career and of his life indeed outside seemed guided by that spirit of bravery which the greatest of American Senators exhibited, in the only boast he ever made, when he quoted to Mr. Calhoun the classic defiance:

Momento cita mors venit, aut victoria laeta.

Mr. CHANDLER'S fame was enlarged by his successful administration of an important Cabinet position. Called by President Grant to the head of the Interior Department by telegraphic summons, he accepted without reluctance and without distrust. His eighteen years of positive and uncompromising course in the Senate had borne the inevitable fruit of many enmities as well as the rich reward of countless friends. The appointment was severely criticised and unsparingly condemned by many who, a year later, were sufficiently just and magnanimous to withdraw their harsh words and bear generous testimony to his executive ability, his painstaking industry, and his inflexible integrity; to his admirable talent for thorough organization and to his prompt and graceful dispatch of public business. What his friends had before known of his character and his capacity the chance of a few brief months in an administrative position had revealed to the entire country and had placed in history.

It would not be just even in the generous indulgence conceded to eulogy to speak of Mr. CHANDLER as a man without faults. But assuredly no enemy, if there be one above his lifeless form, will ever say that he had mean faults. They were all on the generous and larger side of his nature. In amassing his princely fortune he never exacted the pound of flesh; he never ground the faces of the poor; he was never even harsh to an honest debtor unable to pay. His wealth came to him through his own great ability, devoted with unremitting industry for a third of a century to honorable trade in that enlarging, ever-expanding region, whose capacities and resources he was among the earliest to foresee and to appreciate.

To his friends Mr. CHANDLER was devotedly true. Like Colonel Benton, he did not use the word "friend" lightly and without meaning. Nor did he ever pretend to be friendly to a man whom he did not like. He never dissembled. To describe him in the plain and vigorous Saxon which he spoke himself—he was a true friend, a hard hitter, an honest hater.

In that inner circle of home life, sacred almost from reference, Mr. CHANDLER was chivalric in devotion, inexhaustible in affection, and exceptionally happy in all his relations. Whatever of sternness there was in his character, whatever of roughness in his demeanor, whatever of irritability in his temper, were one and all laid aside when he sat at his own hearthstone, or dispensed graceful and generous hospitality to unnumbered guests. There he was seen at his best, and there his friends best love to recall him. As Burke said of Lord Keppel, he was a wild stock of pride on which the tenderest of hearts had grafted the milder virtues.

A sage whose words have comforted many generations of men tells us that when death comes every one can see its deplorable and grievous side—only the wise can see causes for reconcilement. Let us be wise to-day and celebrate the memory of a man who stood on the confines of age without once feeling its weakness or realizing its decay; who passed sixty-six years in this world without losing a single day of mental activity or physical strength; who had a business career of great length and unbroken prosperity; who had attained in public life a fourth election to the Senate of the United States, an honor enjoyed by fewer men in the Republic than even its Chief Rulership, and who strengthening with his years stood higher in the regard of his countrymen, stronger with his constituency, nearer to his friends, and dearer to his kindred, at the close of his career than on any preceding day of his eventful life.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, Illinois by the side of her sister State (Michigan) mourns with her the loss of her honored son. No language of mine will be sufficiently eloquent to portray in fitting terms the loss we all feel in the death of so noble and patriotic a man as was our brother Senator.

Twenty years ago, sir, in this city I made his acquaintance. We then differed in our political theories, but, sir, there was an indescribable something that attracted me and caused me to like the man. During the great rebellion against this Government we became better acquainted and better friends, and from that time up to his death nothing had ever marred our kindly relations. I learned to admire him more and more as I knew him better. No man could know him well without having great respect and admiration for him.

To describe him merely as an ordinary man would be to do his record and memory great injustice. To say that he was a very great man, in the sense in which that term is generally understood, might be considered fulsome praise; but, sir, if greatness consists in the accomplishment of honest purpose, he was truly great. The sixty-six years that have passed over his head were to him replete with honor and prosperity. On whatever line he moved he achieved a triumph. Physically, he was a model of stalwart mold; his mental structure was strong and vigorous; in energy he was not a laggard in anything in which he engaged. He was a thinker, however crude he may have been in speech. He was bold in his expressions and manly in his utterances; his powers of organization and combination were unsurpassed. Those who may have found themselves in opposition to him on any line, political or otherwise, can well attest this fact.

He was not only a man of thought, but of action; he was generous, kind, true, and faithful; his bosom welled up and overflowed with the milk of human kindness; his heart was large enough to embrace within its sympathies all classes; his watchword ever was liberty and protection to all. He was a patriot in the broadest sense in which that term is understood. During his country's severest trials his services in her behalf in giving aid and encouragement to the people of his own State and in the councils of the nation by his bold and fearless course were great. When the storm of secession was fiercest he was boldest; as trials came he rose with the emergency; in the darkest night he was one of the most steadfast stars. Sir, he was by nature a leader and controller of men, possessing all the necessary qualities that would have fitted him for a great field-marshal, the energy, the boldness, the judgment, the decision, the courage, with the capacity for action and council. He was the builder of his own fortunes, and the molder of his own sentiments, a man, sir, true and steadfast to his friends, and one who never asked or begged quarter from an enemy. Yet he was just at all times to friend and foe. His frankness and freedom of expression at times gave offense, when by a different course he might have made his pathway smoother, but he chose to be candid and honest. By this manly course (as is frequently the case) he became the subject of much criticism and vituperation from a class of people that constantly revel in calumny. But, sir, he moved on in his upright course, as became a man of worth, so that before his death he had passed through the mist and clouds of detraction and stood out from among and above them in the full brightness of a glorious vindication.

The evil, that men do, lives after them;
The good is oft interred with their bones.

But, sir, in the case of the deceased Senator his good deeds were so vividly marked that they will live after him in imperishable glory, while the mistakes he may have made (those construed into evil) were of such insignificance that they will soon be lost in the great ocean of forgetfulness.

But, sir, in paying this tribute to his memory, I do not choose to speak of his different official acts. I prefer to leave that duty to others, and to let the history of his country speak of these, along with the ages as they pass. His official record, as a whole, is a grand one, and requires no barren eulogy at my hands.

Mr. President, on the last day of his life, in company with one other gentleman, I came with him from Janesville, Wisconsin, to Chicago. He was apparently in excellent health. On the way once he complained of slight indigestion. At about twelve o'clock I left him at the Grand Pacific Hotel. About five o'clock that afternoon I called at his room, and found him then in exceedingly good spirits and looking in fine condition. At 7.30 he went to McCormick's Hall. There I sat by his side on the stage. At about eight o'clock he was introduced by the president of the Young Men's Auxiliary Club [Mr. Collier] to a grand audience composed of ladies and gentlemen.

He commenced slowly, but warmed up with his subject until he became so eloquent and forcible in his language and illustrations that the audience, in the midst of his speech, arose with one accord and gave three cheers. No orator during an address in the city of Chicago ever received more marked attention or greater applause. He created an enthusiasm that carried all along with it like the rushing force of a mighty storm. This, sir, was the grandest triumph of his life, and he felt it to be so.

He stood forth before that grand audience like a giant, and with full-volumed voice spoke like a Webster or a Douglas. His words were well chosen; his sentences terse and complete, abounding in wit, humor, and happy local hits; his logic came like hot shot in the din of battle, crashing through the oaks of the forest. One of his last sentences still rings in my ears, "Shut up your stores, shut up your manufactories, and go to work for your country." The effect of this last speech of Senator CHANDLER was electrical; its influence is still felt among the business men of Chicago. The meeting adjourned with great demonstrations in favor of the speaker. He left the hall and went directly to his room and soon retired to rest.

The next morning I was sitting with my family at breakfast, in the Palmer House; a gentleman came into the dining-room in great haste and spoke to me, saying, "LOGAN, your friend is dead—found in his room dead."

Sir, I arose and bowed my head; my heart was filled with grief and sorrow. I repaired at once to the room occupied by the Senator in the Grand Pacific Hotel, and there, sir, he lay, in the cold and icy embrace of death.

Yes, sir, dead! He is gone from us. We will hear him no more; his voice is hushed in silence forever. In his room, no one being present with him, in the lonely and solemn gloom of the night, he had passed from life unto death, and in such a peaceful manner that the angel of death must have whispered the message so softly and gently that he knew not his coming. But, sir, what a shock it was to the living. As the fall of the stalwart oak causes a trembling in the surrounding forest, so did the fall of Senator CHANDLER cause the tender chords of the hearts of this people to vibrate with the tender touch of sympathy everywhere.

Sir, the day after his death we took his remains from this lonely chamber to his home in Detroit, and there, in the midst of his grief-stricken family, gently laid them down. A deep, mournful silence hung heavily over the old family mansion.

One unbroken gloom seemed to rest on the clustered trees, where the feathered songsters in spring-time had cheered the happy family with notes of sweetest music. The wintry chill from the snow-blasts without was but a faint type of the deep sadness which hung like a pall over every heart. Even the sighing wind that swept around in its saddened wail seemed to chant a requiem for the departed Senator. Well might his friends weep at their own as well as their country's loss. Indeed, he was a man of whom all may speak in praise, and upon whose bier all may drop the tear of sorrow. When earth received him she took to her bosom one of her manly sons, and when paradise bade his spirit come a noble one entered there.

Mr. President, time brings lessons that teach us that hope does not perish when the stars of life refuse longer to give light.

The death of our brother Senator and those still closely following him, should constantly warn us of the fact, that we are traveling to "the undiscovered country, from whose bourn no traveler returns." 'Tis true the grave in its silence gives forth no voice, nor whispers of the morrow, but there is a voice borne upon the lips of the morning zephyrs, that lets fall a whisper, quickening the heart with a knowledge that there is an abode beyond the tomb. Sir, our lamps are burning now, some more brightly than others; some shed their light from the mountain's top, others from the lowly vales; but let us so trim them that they may all burn with equal brilliancy when relighted in our mansions beyond the mysterious river.

I fondly hope, sir, that there we will again meet our departed friend.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the manly features which stood forth in the character of our deceased associate, like those of his commanding person, were so round and full, so distinctly pronounced, that they could not fail to give the same impression to all observers, and hence our tributes to-day may wear the aspect of photographs of the same figure, with merely variations of posture. After the eloquent full-length representations already supplied, I shall only briefly point out what I have learned to consider as among the distinctive characteristics of that life and form which lately gave such robust assurance of length of days, but which, to our sorrow, has been swiftly summoned, as we all soon must be, to that world of light and hope where the weary are at rest.

The late Senator CHANDLER, as all may know, was born in the southeastern border of New Hampshire, a region which has been wondrously fruitful of distinguished statesmen whose fortune it was to be sent here and long retained as Senators from other and more populous States. Among these eminent men were Webster and Wilson from Massachusetts, Dix from New York, Chase from Ohio, Grimes from Iowa, and Cass from Michigan, who was superseded by him whose decease we now lament. These men, going where they would, were sure to leave their "foot-prints on the sands of time," and were never less than the peers of the foremost men in this body, of which Mr. CHANDLER was so recently a conspicuous member, dear to us and to his own people.

As one of the pioneers of Michigan, his ambition was, through sterling integrity and unflinching resolution, to grasp business on a comprehensive scale, and he, with others, made Detroit, from a small town, a commercial metropolis thoroughly equipped to meet the wants of trade in a great and rapidly growing State. From the start he never underrated the magnificence of western prairies or western forests, nor their present or prospective power, and there he found a congenial home.

Upon his first entrance into this Chamber he brought with him the same invincible energy that had crowned a successful mercantile career. Having led a busy life, with daily opportunities, through extensive observation, to acquire knowledge, he was already a man of affairs, whose ripened judgment commanded respect, and, among measures he was not slow to fix upon the possible best rather than the doubtful, or, among men, to select the competent rather than the incompetent. When he would lead, he boldly marched in front, nor sought to elude the fire of adversaries. Wasting no time in the consideration of the rubbish born of ill-starred experiments, magic-lantern illusions, or incomprehensible theories, he aimed with fearless self-reliance at once to reach sure-footed, solid-sense conclusions, shirking neither work nor danger, and bringing both the strength and courage which he so often found to triumph over all difficulties.

For many years in the Senate he was chairman of the Committee on Commerce—no other so long—and conducted its business with unflagging fidelity and praiseworthy economy. An instance of the latter occurred when a bill, reported by him for river and harbor improvements, had been overloaded here with many prodigal additions, and, rather than to bear the responsibility of an overgrown expenditure, he helped to kill the original offspring of his own committee, by a vote to table the bill. That year no appropriation was made for such objects, and, if there was any log-rolling greed, it received a check.

Mr. CHANDLER was intensely loyal to the Republic—not to a sham, nor to "such stuff as dreams are made of"—but to a sovereignty under organic law, able and ready to give back to its citizens some thing in return for all services demanded. He would have been ashamed of a weak, spineless, and rickety republic, or one on any Spanish American pattern, having no iron in its blood, and ready to break down at the first hostile pronunciamento; but he was proud of that which stands forth great both in peace and war, and by its regard for law and order, by its devotion to human rights, by its adherence to every pledge of public faith, by its matchless march of freedom and its progressive spirit, has also shown itself worthy to rule and protect, with an imperishable vitality, the American continent.

The attitude of foreign nations during the late rebellion could not fail to be watched by our people, as it was by Senator CHANDLER, with constant solicitude, not—whatever that attitude might have been—as throwing any doubt upon the final triumph of the Union arms, but as a contingency which at times threatened to prolong a bloody contest and to multiply its griefs. Our Republic, it is not to be concealed, had few hearty friends among the monarchs and oligarchs of Europe, but we now know that the Queen of Great Britain, in spite of the sinister advice of Napoleon the Villain, was wiser and less unfriendly than any of her colonies, or than some of her ministers, who vainly hoped to gain untold advantages by breaking up the American Government into smaller and possibly less formidable proportions. Senator CHANDLER, however, never lacking audacity to defend the national life at all hazards, was one of those who did not believe the United States were any too large, and he had an abiding faith that its power would always be growing larger. His home confronted the western gateway to a large, but not invulnerable, British province, and he was wont to be impatient—genial as was his natural temperament—that the government of a great and kindred people, bound to us also by paramount commercial interests, should in such a crisis take a hostile or even a doubtful position, which he thought would have been most carefully if not fraternally avoided, provided our forces by land and sea had not been supposed to be fully employed against those to whom "belligerent rights" had been wrongly conceded. Senator CHANDLER'S repeated denunciations of the primarily responsible party to the piratical raids of the Alabama and Shenandoah were loud and unstinted, and he insisted that, for these and other national wrongs, we held a valid lien upon the Canadas to be enforced at our will and pleasure. He gave utterance in the white heat of the strife to some rather angry philippics, but the gentle sway of the Queen saved our people from any attempt to show, as no doubt many were eager to show, that there was method in the Senator's madness. As chairman of the Committee on Commerce, he could not look with composure upon the capture of American ships, nor upon their forced transfer to escape capture, and he resented the foul blow by which the ancient mistress of the ocean appeared to profit.

If, then, he showed some bitterness to foreigners whose sympathies were openly against us during the war, we may not wonder at, and should pardon, his profounder indignation that any one of his own countrymen, without provocation, should have been so dead to patriotism as to be willing that the nation should perish, or to forget that

This is my own, my native land.

For a violent and bloody rebellion, against a government wholly free and popular, any tolerance seemed to him too much and any chastisement too little. But it was the rectification of national authority he sought—not personal vengeance.

In 1875, soon after a protracted service of eighteen years in the United States Senate, covering great epochs and crises in our history, he was appointed, by President Grant, Secretary of the Department of the Interior—a Department of the government which, perhaps, through its multifarious branches, is more than any other directly seen and felt by the people. The Patent, Pension, Land and Indian Bureaus—to say nothing of the educational and census dependencies—each and all require the perpetual and vigilant supervision of the Secretary, and it may be said that no other Department is more exposed to public criticism or to private suspicion; but when Mr. CHANDLER entered this new and untried field of duties, he at the outset exhibited his mastery by organizing every branch of the service upon "business principles," and thus its vast machinery, reaching to our remotest boundaries, moved without noise and without friction. The confidence of the people, in the integrity and efficiency of the Department of the Interior, became complete, and, when the Secretary left the office, he had, as an executive officer, largely advanced a reputation already national.

At our last session he reappeared here, returned for the fourth time, in his senatorial character, but alas! only to remain long enough to show to him the unending attachment of his people—to us the brittleness of human life.

Along with a stalwart frame, he carried a stalwart will, and was blessed with that outspoken decision of character which leans not to the right nor left to obtain support. Physically and mentally he was muscular, and, if he could have been vain of anything, as he was not, it might have been as an athlete. He never complained of overwork, whether that work was official, or on the stump, on the "conduct of the war," or on the conduct of his model farm, which for some years had most engaged his affections and fully justified his pride. Not unmindful of the rank won and worn as a merchant, nor of the honor he kept bright as a Senator, he yet at heart and at home preferred to be kown as a great farmer, and as such, with all the rest added, he will be known and long remembered by the people of the State he loved so well.

Senator CHANDLER was a partisan, never a neutral, but a republican of the straitest sect. By no free-trade tariff would he build up foreign trade on a degraded people, nor build up a gambling home trade on money intrinsically unsound. He was a staunch friend of internal improvements, and on such questions as the equality of man before the law, land for the landless, schools for the illiterate, he might almost be styled a Hebrew of the Hebrews. He believed in republican men and measures, and so believed because to him they were nothing less than the custodians and sure promises of the honor and prosperity of the country. His opinions, based upon full and life-long convictions, were stoutly held, and did not ebb and flow with every change of the moon. He was not a frequent speaker in the Senate, and his wit never got blunted by having too fine a point, but when he did speak, having something to say, his words were so hearty and straightforward that neither friend nor foe could deny their ringing force or misinterpret their meaning.

Never claiming the glittering refinements or eloquence of the schools, nor trying to escape oblivion by rhetoric, yet his aid as a campaign speaker was widely sought, and the remarkable speech, delivered by him on the evening destined to be his last upon earth, may be cited as an example of his vigor, pungency, and effectiveness as a political orator.

And thus we bid adieu to a strong man, to a true and loyal spirit, to him whose impassioned devotion to his whole country was only comparable to the tender love he bore in all his relations as a son, husband, and father.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the man whose obsequies are now being celebrated in the august halls of the Capitol was one of the extraordinary characters of American history.

His career from the hearthstone to the tomb was one of singular individuality and power. It was one constant and successful struggle between great native forces marshaled by an heroic and aggressive soul, and every form of opposition to his personal advancement and to the purposes of a patriotic public life, yet he never encountered an obstacle which he did not destroy. He was over all mortal combatants conqueror, until on the very summit of victory, at the close of a stern and incessant warfare prolonged for nearly seventy years, with his eye still burning like the eagle's, and his arm still raised in mighty action, Death killed him as with a feather, and the commanding form was forever still; the strong intellect, the storm-compelling will, and imperial soul vanished from sublunary affairs. There was not even a premonitory suggestion, the tinkling of a servant's bell; not one lifted finger of friendship, not one parting tear of love.

When shall the promise of inspiration be fulfilled? When shall Death, the last enemy, be himself destroyed? In this presence God alone is great.

ZACHARIAH CHANDLER was a son of New Hampshire, and the State which even in these latter days has given to the country some of the greatest men of modern or of any times—among them Cass, and Hale, and Wilson, and Chase, and the colossal genius of Webster—is proud to add his name to the long list of her heroes, philanthropists, and statesmen. Born and nurtured among the grand and beautiful scenes of mountain, valley, lake, and stream which have given to New Hampshire the name of the Switzerland of America, Mr. CHANDLER felt from childhood that his future lay in the vast possibilities of the West; that there alone was room for the energy and enterprise of his unfolding powers, and that he must consecrate his strong arm and his sagacious, indomitable, and freedom-loving soul to the development of the great central region of the Republic. At the age of nineteen years he departed from Bedford, near Manchester, the home of his youth, where still abound affectionate memories of his marked qualities indicative of the coming man, and planted himself on the shores of the great lake which constitutes the focus of our inland commerce, and which has given its name to one of the happiest and most powerful of American Commonwealths. There during forty-six years, comprising the most remarkable period of our domestic development and, I think, of our national history, ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, more than any other of her citizens, was the State of Michigan; and during the last twenty-five years, with but few exceptions, as much as any other one man, he has shaped the destinies of the United States.

While for one-fourth of a century he was a conspicuous figure in public affairs, I do not deny that others may have filled a larger space in the gazettes, and a few—a very few—may have been more important factors in the course of events. Yet I know not of ten men in his generation who, in my belief, have furnished so much of courage and fidelity; of will-power and aggressiveness, tempered by discretion and common sense; of stanch and granitic consecration to convictions; of deep, unvarying purpose, which defied calamity and laughed at vicissitude; of staying and recuperating power in adversity as well as of tremendous energy in the hour of decisive action, as the man to whose memory this brief hour is given.

Mr. CHANDLER was sometimes considered harsh in his feelings toward political opponents, and notably toward a section of our common country whose people were specially identified with political principles which he rejected, and an institution which it was one of the great purposes of his life to destroy. But never beat gentler heart in the breast of woman. His blood coursed in molten tides of hate toward every appearance of wrong, and of love for every portion of his country and for all mankind. His giant form and rugged outlines were the home of one of the most magnanimous natures I ever knew. His eyes were full of tears for every form of distress; his hand was full of relief. His life is a record of unobtrusive and unselfish good deeds.

He was a radical, but a radical is the only true conservative. He had plowed deep, and he knew the fundamental principles of things. He knew that principles never temporize, no matter what those may do who profess them; that they are exacting and inexorable, and utterly regardless of the state of the vote or the count, whether fair or false; that they cannot be waived or violated or suppressed or conciliated. He knew, and what he knew he felt, that principles will always have their day in court, and that against us or our children God will give them judgment and execution and satisfaction thereof to the uttermost farthing for their every violation. He had seen death and destruction, the fell officers of eternal justice, abroad in the land levying upon the very life of our own generation the tremendous damages which three centuries of outraged humanity had recovered against this nation, and he knew that, unless the present and future should conform absolutely to the eternal principles of right and do impartial justice to the feeblest human being within our borders, tears and woe and death will pay for it to the last fraction of our treasure and the last drop of our blood. Therefore was he stalwart; therefore did he grieve over the vanities of conciliation when he thought that principles elementary and sacred were sacrificed in the vain hope that peace would come from their violation; that God would be mocked out of his intelligence and purposes, and permit the tiniest child to be robbed of the smallest right with impunity. He felt that the nation and the statesman who temporize and tamper with principles are playing with the hottest fire of Heaven's wrath, and that there is no true conservatism which does not consist in the most radical application of immutable justice to every race and individual among men.

Mr. CHANDLER was only radical against what he understood to be wrong. He distinguished between the wrong and the wrong-doer. While he hated the former he would rescue the latter, who is as often a victim as an aggressor. His war was upon systems and policies, not upon individuals and communities.

He was as anxious for the prosperity and happiness and as jealous of the renown of the South as of the North. He was great and broad, and would have been beloved by Washington and Madison and Jefferson and by the whole family of patriots who worshipped the principles of the great Declaration which they promulgated, and who "trembled for their country when they remembered that God is just."

It may be said of him that he was a strong partisan. This is only to praise him. The man who is not a partisan is without convictions, or if he has convictions he is false to them. That he was a bigot I deny. He was simply and sublimely true. He knew not how to prevaricate or apostatize or "keep the word of promise to our ear, and break it to our hope." In disaster and exigency, amid defection and demoralization he became the front because he was always in the advance, and, wherever others might go, he never fell back. Nobody and nothing dismayed him. He was like a living rock on the eternal battle line between right and wrong. There he stood "fixed like a tower" for support in onset, for shelter and for rally in repulse and despair.

He was not more ultra than others, but he was more steadfast and courageously true to his cause. He only went with them to the full length of their common belief and professions—but there he staid. His action was not that of mercury in long-tubed thermometers, rising and falling with the weather of expediency, but he found the line where he belonged and he fought it out there—not only if it took all summer, but all winter and all time.

And so it was that he expired in the hour of his greatest usefulness, while he was once more rallying the host and the most vital political truths, as he understood them and as the fathers of the Republic understood them, were echoing from his lips on the midnight air of the Queen City by the lakes. And still

Their echoes roll from soul to soul
And grow forever and forever.

His career is a rare illustration of the excellence of our institutions. It is full of hope to every struggling, brave-hearted youth who feels conscious of noble purpose and inherent power.

ZACHARIAH CHANDLER was a patriot, a statesman, and an honest man. He was of God's noblest work. In such case

'Tis not so difficult to die.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I desire to add my tribute to one who for a much longer time than the majority of Senators was a member of this body. ZACHARIAH CHANDLER was four times chosen by his adopted State to represent her in the Senate. Few have been honored so frequently. This alone would be sufficient to say of him in pronouncing his eulogy, for no man need desire higher praise than to have said of him that he spent one-third of his entire life in faithful public service. That such service was rendered by Mr. CHANDLER we all know. That he was appreciated by his people, none can deny who witnessed the evidences of sadness that were portrayed upon the countenances of thousands of his constituents as the last sad rites were being paid to his memory. In all that has been said here of his patriotism nothing has been uttered that ought not to have been, for nothing more can be said of him than he deserved. Michigan has lost a brave, faithful, honest representative, and her people may well mourn.

I did not expect to do so, nor can I add one word to that which has been spoken that would be worthy of him. I merely desired to place my words, crude and simple as they are, alongside of those more worthy and appropriate addresses which have been placed upon the records of the Senate in memory of one with whom I served both in the Cabinet and in the Senate, and who in all the relations of life, both public and private, was my friend.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, it is with feelings of painful sensibility that I add my tribute to what has already been uttered, and these are deeply intensified when I recall the unbroken friendship which for more than forty years existed between the late Senator CHANDLER and myself.

Born and reared amid the hills of a New England State that has given to the country many distinguished statesmen, his character largely partook of the spot of his nativity.

His educational advantages were confined to the studies of the common school and the country academy of those days. The wise and efficient use he made of them is abundantly demonstrated in the honorable record of his life.

While yet a youth, stimulated by a laudable ambition, he sought a wider, a more promising sphere than the circumscribed boundaries of his home afforded. The expanding West, with its great possibilities, beckoned him to its inviting fields. Bidding adieu to the home of his childhood he removed to Detroit, then but little more than a military post on the frontier of civilized life. Before attaining his majority he established a mercantile business, carrying into his daily life those habits of industry and frugality which he had been taught and which were illustrated in all his subsequent career.

He had started in life with the unwavering determination to make no compromise of principle. In this he was as firm as the granite hills of his native State. Success was his motto; but it must be attained through industry and integrity alone. From this purpose he never swerved, and during a business life of many years, marked by the vicissitudes which are inseparable from commercial pursuits, his reputation was spotless.

Under the principles which Mr. CHANDLER brought to his daily avocations he reaped his reward, not alone in abundant wealth, but in the well-earned confidence which the people of Michigan placed in his high capability and character.

Coupled with an earnest devotion to the demands of a business steadily enlarging, he took a deep interest in the political and other questions of the day. From his boyhood he had displayed that quickness of comprehension and sterling common sense, that intuitive knowledge of men and things, which were of so great service to him in those after years when, called from the pursuits of a mercantile life, he was invested with duties and responsibilities grave and national in their character.

At an early day, and at a time when the political party with which he was identified was in a minority, he had been chosen mayor of Detroit. In this his first official position he displayed executive abilities and those qualifications needful in the exalted stations he afterward so ably filled.

Nominated in 1852 as the candidate of the whig party for governor, he made his first appearance as a political speaker in a vigorous canvass of the State, but failed of an election.

An anti-slavery whig from principle, opposed to oppression in every form, he took a prominent and efficient part in the organization of the republican party in 1854, devoting the best energies of his after life in promoting its success.

In 1857 he was chosen by the Legislature to represent Michigan in this body. His immediate predecessor was that distinguished Senator, Cabinet minister, diplomat, and scholar, General Lewis Cass. Called as Mr. CHANDLER was from an active commercial life without previous training, to take the place of this eminent man, whose long life had been spent in the public service, there were those who doubted his success, but those doubts were speedily dispelled. In the Senate Chamber, as in every station he was called upon to fill, he never failed to prove himself equal to the duties which devolved upon him.

It is not needful for me to speak particularly of his career in the Senate, of the conspicuous position he occupied, and the influence he exerted in this body. That has already been done by his associates who so well knew and appreciated the excellence of his judgment and the earnestness with which his duties were discharged. But I may say that the eighteen years of his continuous service was the most eventful period in the history of the country. The stability of the Constitution and the very existence of the Government were put to their severest test. An irrepressible conflict existed in the national Legislature and throughout the land; the sovereignty of the Union was threatened. During the dark years of civil war which followed, the unceasing earnestness with which all his powers were devoted to sustain the administration in its efforts for the preservation of the Republic are too well known, too deeply engraved in the hearts of the people, to need more than a passing notice. In all these hours of gloom and sorrow, in all the vicissitudes of victory and defeat, in all the demands that were made on the blood, the treasure, and the patriotism of the people, he never faltered in his convictions of duty, or of the triumph of the flag, and the full restoration of the power and unity of the Government.

There is one thing in the senatorial career of Mr. CHANDLER to which I may refer. While he was identified with all the leading measures of Congress, he was untiring in his devotion to the interests of Michigan and the great Northwest. His promptness in aiding the citizens of his State without distinction of creed or party was proverbial. His zeal and fidelity in this particular were as broad as the Commonwealth that had so gladly honored him. It was this which added so largely to his popularity at home; and his warmest friends were found alike in all parties.

Called by President Grant to the Secretaryship of the Interior, he assumed the duties of this perplexing bureau, displaying a tact, an energy, and an executive ability that surprised even those who knew him best. With clear head and stout heart, prevailing evils were stamped out with unfaltering courage. With an unswerving purpose he brought order out of confusion, infusing new life into the various branches of the Department, and clearly demonstrated that the public service can be successfully accomplished by bringing to its aid unflinching integrity and vigorous common sense.

At the close of the administration of President Grant, Mr. CHANDLER returned to his home and to private life. Popular fallacies upon the subject of the currency had been widely disseminated; Michigan was not exempt from the contagion. These were to be met with argument and the delusions dispelled. It was then that he relinquished his plans for recreation and an anticipated foreign trip, and again buckling on his armor, with his accustomed energy, he led the van in a decisive and victorious battle for honest money.

There are but few leaders of men; Mr. CHANDLER was clearly one of the few. For more than a quarter of a century he had been a faithful servant of the people. In 1878 he was again returned to the Senate, and he brought with him the same unceasing devotion to his State and his country that had ever characterized his public life. His voice again heard in the Senate Chamber had no uncertain sound, and was echoed to the ends of the land.

During the autumnal months of the year which has just closed, Mr. CHANDLER was almost constantly occupied in addressing large assemblies of the people, in various sections of the country, on the political topics of the day. In arousing and retaining the interest of an audience, few men possess his magnetic power. In these, his later efforts, he seemed to display new energy and power, achieving a remarkable reputation as a most effective public speaker. His fame and his popularity were at their zenith. Had his life been spared, it is more than probable that the representatives from the State he had so long and so faithfully served would, with one voice have presented his name as their first choice for the most exalted position in the gift of the people.

On the evening of the last day of October he addressed the people of Chicago. And never had he spoken more acceptably. Making his arrangements to return to his home the next day, he retired to his room, and, after pleasant converse with friends, at the midnight hour he lay down to rest. It was that peaceful rest which shall remain unbroken until the archangel's trump shall be heard at the great day.

I need not speak particularly of Mr. CHANDLER'S domestic life, or of his warm attachment to those who made up his home circle. We have to speak of him as a friend, a citizen, a public man. Strong in his convictions, stalwart in his opinions, and fearless in their avowal, there was no bitterness in his nature: all his tendencies were to the genial side of life.

Friend of my youth, companion of my manhood and of my maturer years, farewell! Strong in the defense of right, true in friendship, and unsullied in integrity, may we who yet linger be imitators of those traits which ennobled your life and have engraved your name upon the imperishable pages of your country's history.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the pending resolutions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously; and (at two o'clock and forty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 28, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WALTER D. PLOWDEN.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I find by the RECORD that during my absence from the city, on motion of Mr. DE LA MATYR, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Walter D. Plowden, there being no adverse report thereon. I desire to state that the committee have investigated these papers, and are now ready to make a report in the case. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the former order of the House be vacated.

The SPEAKER. The truth is, in many cases of this sort where papers are withdrawn the Chair does not inquire into the motive; but the effect of the withdrawal is to prevent a report on the case. The rule requires that the consent of the committee having charge of the matter should be obtained before the papers are withdrawn, but by unanimous consent the rule is vacated. The Chair thinks that the new rules will remedy this abuse.

The Chair revokes as far as he can with the consent of the House the order for the withdrawal of these papers, for the reason stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin that the committee are now ready to report on the case, and if the papers are withdrawn, of course it deprives the committee of that power.

SAN ANTONIO AND MEXICAN BORDER RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. SHELLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 2967) to authorize the Secretary of War to contract with the San Antonio and Mexican Border Railroad Company for the immediate construction of a railroad from San Antonio to a point on the Rio Grande at or near the town of Laredo, for the purpose of establishing a postal and military highway from the United States military headquarters at San Antonio, Texas, to the Mexican border; and moved that the bill and amendments be printed, and recommitted to the Cmmittee on Railways and Canals, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

EDGAR HUSON.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

SITE FOR UNITED STATES NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

Mr. MORSE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 891) to locate and purchase a new site for the United States Naval Observatory.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a commission be appointed to select a site for a new Naval Observatory, the said site to possess the relative advantages of facility of access from the city of Washington, healthfulness, clearness of atmosphere, freedom from obstruction for the horizon, and freedom from objectionable vibrations from traffic or other causes, with ability to have sufficient water supply.

The commission shall consist of one member of the Senate Naval Committee, to be chosen by the President of the Senate, one member of the House Naval Committee, to be chosen by the Speaker of the House, and the Superintendent of the Naval Observatory.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $75,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to purchase said site; but $5,000 of said sum is reserved for incidental expenses of selecting said site, and for detailed drawings, plans, and estimates for said new observatory. But no money shall be paid for said site until the Attorney-General shall have given a favorable opinion as to the sufficiency of the title of said selected site.

SEC. 3. That upon selection of a site for said observatory by said commission, they shall report their action to the President, who shall direct the Secretary of the Navy to make the purchase of such site, taking title thereto in the name of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to offer an amendment. I ask the Clerk to read again that portion of the bill which states the questions to be considered by the commission.

The Clerk read as follows:

That a commission be appointed to select a site for a new Naval Observatory, the said site to possess the relative advantages of facility of access from the city of Washington, healthfulness, clearness of atmosphere, freedom from obstruction for the horizon, and freedom from objectionable vibrations from traffic or other causes, with ability to have sufficient water supply.

Mr. CONGER. I offer the following amendment to come in after the words "Naval Observatory:"

If practicable to be upon an even degree of longitude west of Greenwich, and.

The present observatory is not located on an even degree; and there are fractional calculations to be made in reducing all the observations for the United States to Greenwich longitude. I am informed that a very slight difference of location at some point around this city will bring the observatory exactly upon an even degree of longitude west of Greenwich, and it is very important that, if possible, that be done.

Mr. MORSE. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If I understand the gentleman from Michigan, his amendment is not compulsory. It leaves the matter, as I understand, within the discretion of the commission.

Mr. CONGER. I have inserted in the amendment the words "if practicable." I merely desire to call the attention of the commission to this matter.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. There can be no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. BREWER. I ask consent to submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House, with all convenient speed, the number of public buildings in process of construction and which have been commenced or completed under his direction within the last three years. Also,

First. The limited cost provided by law for each of such buildings, if any such limit was fixed;

Second. The actual cost of such buildings as have been completed, and the excess of the cost of each above the amount limited;

Third. The amount expended on such buildings as are in process of construction;

Fourth. The probable and estimated cost of completing such buildings as are in process of construction; and Fifth. The reasons why such buildings have cost or will cost, if such be the fact, more than the amount limited or fixed by law.

The SPEAKER. What action does the gentleman ask upon the resolution which has been read?

Mr. BREWER. I ask that it be considered and adopted at this time.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Let it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The committee under the rule will be required to report within one week, should the resolution be referred to it. Does the gentleman consent to that reference?

Mr. BREWER. I suppose I will have to let it go there.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

DELLA BENNER.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have considered at this time a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the name of Della Benner, widow of the late Lieutenant Hiram H. Benner, Company C, Eighteenth Infantry.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to have placed upon the pension-roll the name of Della Benner, widow of the late Hiram H. Benner, of Company C, Eighteenth Infantry.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3980) was received and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I offer this bill for the purpose of providing in some measure for the care and support of a young wife, left in poverty and widowhood, and of two little children, left in dependent orphanage by the death of the husband and father, a tried and faithful soldier, who perished in the holy cause of suffering humanity. I urge its passage for the further purpose of placing on permanent, lasting record in the archives of its legislation a great nation's appreciation of a courage and heroism that has no precedent in all its annals and no parallel in all the history of noble deeds. I would thus pay a fitting tribute to the name and memory of a man whose grandeur of character and nobility of action mark him as a central figure among those whom history has made immortal for the benefactions they have conferred upon mankind.

The touching story of Lieutenant Benner's kindly sympathy with the sufferers from yellow fever during its recent fearful reign in the South, his bravery in going to their succor, and his sad yet heroic death while engaged in that generous service is fresh in the public mind and will not be forgotten while our country has a history.

It will be remembered how, in the darkest hour of the plague, when its daily victims were being numbered by hundreds and even thousands, the whole people of the North, moved by one common impulse of generous humanity, sought to devise some means by which their boundless donations of everything needful for the relief of the stricken victims could most safely and speedily reach them, that Alexander R. Shepherd, the able and indefatigable president of the National Relief Association, arranged for a relief-boat to descend the Mississippi River from Saint Louis, carrying provisions and medical stores to all the infected cities and towns below. The supplies and necessary transportation were quickly procured and forwarded to Saint Louis, but a proper officer was wanted to command the vessel upon the perilous voyage it was to undertake. Few men, however brave, would have sought such a position, or willingly encountered the fearful dangers it involved. The most fearless and determined might have shrunk from such a task without dishonor; but there was a man found equal to the occasion, and impelled by a chivalry that would have done honor to any hero of modern or ancient history, and a sense of duty to his fellow-men such as is only found in the most exalted natures and highest types of manhood, he promptly, without solicitation, volunteered for a service fraught with a hundred-fold greater danger than ever confronted a soldier upon the bloodiest field of battle. That man was Hiram H. Benner, a lieutenant in the Eighteenth United States Infantry, and then stationed on duty at Atlanta, Georgia.

His services having been accepted, and permission given by the proper military authorities, he parted from his comrades, his young wife and little children, and hurried to Saint Louis, reported to Governor Shepherd, and immediately embarked upon the voyage of succor and relief to others, but, alas! of death to himself.

Regardless of self, thoughtless of the fearful danger he was braving, he left a place of safety, and intent only upon the high mission which he had sought, bent his journey toward the region where desolation and death reigned supreme—where the merciless plague preyed unrestrained upon helpless, trembling victims. When he had traversed all the country smitten with the pestilence—when he had well-nigh finished the noble work with which he was charged; when about to turn his face again toward the North, a woman, without friends or protection, flying from the fever, sought refuge upon his vessel and kindness at his hands, and with that gentleness and chivalry which were a part of his nature, both were cheerfully accorded, and his own apartments were surrendered to her use. But, unconsciously, she was already a victim of the dreadful contagion, its deadly poison was already flowing in her veins, and from her it was soon communicated to her generous and unselfish benefactor. Undismayed, but conscious of his peril, he confronted it with the unfaltering courage of the true soldier that he was, and battled bravely against the shadowy monster that assailed him; but all his sturdy manhood was unable to shake off its icy grasp, and he calmly yielded up as noble a life, as gallant a spirit, as ever animated a human body.

Few men who have ever served their government have left behind them a more honorable record than Lieutenant Benner.

Born in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and enlisting on the 24th of September, 1861, at the age of eighteen, as a private in Company E, Thirty-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, the records of the War Department show that he encountered all the dangers, privations, and vicissitudes incident to military service during the war.

He was in the hospital in Nashville from June 24 to November 13, 1862, and was present with his company and participated in the battle of Shiloh, Tennessee, April 7, 1862; before Corinth, Mississippi, May 29, 1862; at Triune, Tennessee, December 27, 1862, and at Stone River, December 31, 1862. He was taken prisoner at the last-named battle, and was paroled at City Point, Virginia, January 20, 1863, and was sent to Camp Parole, at Annapolis, Maryland. In March, 1863, he was sent to Benton Barracks, Missouri. On June 9, 1862, rejoined his company, and was in the battle at Liberty Gap, Tennessee, June 24, 1862.

He was in the hospital at Nashville from October 10, 1863, to some time in 1864, being reported present on the rolls of his company in March and April, 1864. He was present with his company and fought gallantly at the battle at Rocky Face Ridge, Georgia, May 9, 1864; Resaca, Georgia, May 14, 1864; Rome, Georgia, May 17, 1864, and was again taken prisoner in an engagement near Dallas, Georgia, May 24, 1864, and was paroled at Charleston, South Carolina, December 11, 1864, and furloughed December 26, 1864, for thirty days, then to report at Camp Chase, Ohio, and was finally honorably mustered out of service at Springfield, Illinois, February 22, 1865, to date from February 8, 1865. He was commissioned and mustered in as captain Company F, Eighteenth Illinois Volunteers, March 25, 1865, to serve one year, and served with his company until honorably mustered out therewith, December 16, 1865, at Pine Bluff, Arkansas.

He was appointed second lieutenant in the Eighteenth Infantry June 20, 1867, and was promoted first lieutenant in that regiment May 1, 1875. His appointment in the regular Army was recommended for soldierly conduct and efficiency by Hon. E. B. Washburne, his Representative in Congress, Governor Oglesby, of Illinois, Lieutenant-Colonel Webber, commanding Eighteenth Illinois Volunteers, and by General U. S. Grant, the then General of the Army.

He joined his regiment in September, 1867, and served with it in

Dakota and Wyoming Territories to April, 1869, and in Georgia and South Carolina to September 29, 1878, when he started from his station at Atlanta, Georgia, to Saint Louis, to enter upon the service in which he lost his life.

Thus we find him following the banner under which he served through all the perils of the war, sickness, battles, and imprisonments—being twice in hospitals, twice a prisoner, and fighting safely through nine bloody battles.

A nobler or grander sacrifice was never laid upon the altar of humanity, a broader philanthropy and higher aim never guided human action, and a more heroic death never crowned a more honorable and unselfish life. Virtues and heroism such as Lieutenant Benner exhibited illustrated the highest traits of American character, and they should be cherished as priceless jewels in the American heart, and be recorded upon the brighest pages of American history. Such a life, such actions, and such a death as his exalts humanity and ennobles mankind. His name should live in the annals of his country as one of the most heroic of its citizens, and his memory be embalmed in the hearts of his countrymen as one of the noblest and most unselfish of its martyrs. A soldier, revering his Government, loving its flag, and following his conviction and duty, he fought gallantly against the people of the South in our unfortunate civil strife on many a hardly contested field, yet, when in the providence of God they were overwhelmed with a visitation that darkened their section with the shadow of death and filled their households with mourning, he came to their rescue as gallantly as he had met them in battle, and fought without fear a noiseless, invisible specter, more dangerous than any human enemy and more terrible than an army with banners. And in doing so he not only exhibited the generosity of his character and the nobility of his own nature, but he inculcated a lesson of charity and fraternity broad as our whole country, and that will, I trust, bear golden fruit to coming generations.

I would that the kindly fraternal feeling that sent him on his mission of mercy might continue to flow forever from the North to the South, like the ceaseless tide of the mighty river that bore him on his journey of death; and I would that every wind wafted to the North might be freighted with blessings and benedictions from the South. In the name of humanity and Christian charity I offer to the name and character of Lieutenant Benner the homage and reverence of the whole American people; to his stricken wife I tender the sympathy of every southern woman, and to his orphaned little ones the prayers and benedictions of every southern child.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN NEW YORK AND VERMONT.

Mr. LAPHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 2817) giving the consent of Congress to an agreement or compact entered into between the States of New York and Vermont respecting the boundary between said States. As this is a bill entirely local in its nature, upon which it is important that action be taken at this time, I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Whereas the general assembly of the State of Vermont at its October session, A. D. 1876, passed an act which was approved on the 27th day of November of the same year, declaring that "all that portion of the town of Fair Haven, in the county of Rutland and State of Vermont, lying westerly from the middle of the deepest channel of Poultney River as it now runs, and between the middle of the deepest channel of said river and the west line of the State of Vermont as at present established, is hereby ceded and relinquished to the State of New York, in full and absolute right and jurisdiction." And also declaring "that this act shall not take effect until the State of New York shall have assented to the same, nor until the same shall have been approved by an act of the Congress of the United States;" and

Whereas "the people of the State of New York represented in senate and assembly" did, by act approved March 20, A. D. 1879, enact that "sovereignty and jurisdiction over all that portion of the town of Fair Haven, in the county of Rutland and State of Vermont, lying westerly from the middle of the deepest channel of Poultney River, as it now runs, and between the middle of the deepest channel of said river and the west line of the State of Vermont, as at present established," "and the same is described in an act of the Legislature of the State of Vermont entitled 'An act annexing that portion of the town of Fair Haven, lying west of Poultney River, to the State of New York,' and approved by the governor of the said State of Vermont November 27, A. D. 1876, and the cession of the same to the State of New York is hereby accepted by the State of New York;" and also enacting that "this act shall take effect when the Congress of the United States shall consent to such cession and annexation:" Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the consent of the Congress of the United States is hereby given to the said agreement, compact, and cession, and every part and article thereof.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAPHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GIBBES & CO.

On motion of Mr. KNOTT, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 185) for the relief of Gibbes & Co., of Charleston, South Carolina, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

MONUMENT TO GENERAL HERKIMER.

Mr. McCOOK. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House passed without a dissenting voice a bill introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] appropriating $120,000 to carry into effect an act of Congress passed in 1781. I ask unanimous consent to have considered this morning a bill which has been approved by the Committee on Military Affairs, appropriating one-thirtieth of that amount to provide a statue to the memory of General Herkimer, who fought a decisive battle in the valley of the Mohawk in the year 1777. This bill is to give effect to a resolution of the Continental Congress.

The bill (H. R. No. 165) to consummate the resolution of the Continental Congress of October 4, 1777, and erect a monument to the memory of Brigadier-General Herkimer as herein directed, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized, and he is hereby directed, to pay to the Oneida Historical Society, of Utica, New York, out of the Treasury, from any moneys not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,100, for the purpose and to be used by said society in carrying out and consummating the resolution of the Continental Congress of the United States of America, passed October 4, 1777, providing for the erection of a monument to the memory of Brigadier-General Herkimer, who commanded at the battle of Oriskany, and was there "killed fighting gallantly in defense of the liberties of these States."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCOOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STONE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour begins at twelve minutes before one o'clock. Reports from committees are in order; and the call rests with the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

SALARIES OF CERTAIN POSTMASTERS.

Mr. STONE, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported as a substitute for joint resolution No. 27 a bill (H. R. No. 3981) authorizing and directing the Postmaster-General to readjust the salaries of certain postmasters in accordance with the provision of section 8 of the act of June 12, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HARRISS & HODGE.

On motion of Mr. STONE, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3430) for the relief of Harriss & Hodge, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

POSTAL ROUTES.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 3384) declaring all public roads postal routes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all public roads and highways are hereby declared post-routes, and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to put postal service upon all such routes when the public necessity may require it.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out the following words:

And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to put postal service upon all such routes when the public necessity may require it.

Mr. COOK. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have the attention of the House for a short time while I state my impression as to the effect of this bill if it should become a law. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all public roads and highways are hereby declared post-routes.

The constitutional provision is "the Congress shall have power" "to establish post-offices and post-roads." Under this provision Congress may establish a post-road anywhere within the limits of the United States, and once established it remains a post-road until the same power which made it unmakes it. Heretofore it has been the practice of Congress to establish the termini of a post-route, and by general enactment, section 3972, Revised Statutes, it is provided "when there is more than one road between places designated by law for a post-road, the Postmaster-General may direct which shall be considered the post-road." Ordinarily the State authorities establish a public highway, and especially in the new States. It frequently becomes necessary to vacate, change, and relocate roads; and no doubt, in view of that fact, Congress has heretofore established the termini of post-routes only and, by section 3972 of Revised Statutes, just read, given the Postmaster-General from time to time the power to choose different roads between the termini, so as to better accommodate both the United States and the people of the States by changing the road actually traveled as the convenience of all concerned may require.

Now, this bill makes all public roads and highways post-routes. That is all right so far as the United States is concerned, but would work a hardship to the people of the States if enacted into law. All existing public roads at once are established as post-routes, and it is not in the power of any State, county, or township authorities to vacate or change a post-route established by Congress.

Mr. DIBRELL. Do you hold that counties have no authority to change a road which has been made a post-route?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No, sir.

Mr. DIBRELL. That is your argument now.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not at all, sir The gentleman has listened to me to little purpose, or I have failed to make myself understood in the statement of a prior proposition, that heretofore Congress has been careful in the exercise of this power to avoid this very difficulty by establishing post-routes from one post-office to another, for instance, from Memphis to Little Rock. It has been very careful to give the Postmaster-General power from time to time to choose the route upon which the mail shall be carried, and when it is carried on a route that route becomes a post-route, and when the mail ceases to be carried on that route it remains no longer a post-route. But that is not this proposition, I beg the gentleman from Tennessee to observe. This bill proposes to make every public highway, no matter where it is, in the United States a post-route, and I call the attention of the House to the fact that no roads, canals, or rivers (with the exception of railroads) ever have been established as post-routes except for the time during which the mails are carried upon them. For example, section 3964 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

The following are established post-roads:
All the waters of the United States, during the time the mail is carried thereon.
All canals, during the time the mail is carried thereon.
All plank-roads during the time the mail is carried thereon.

I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, this bill ought to be taken out of the morning hour and set for some day for consideration, or referred to the Committee of the Whole, so that full opportunity may be given for discussion and amendment.

So much, Mr. Speaker, for the necessity of amending the bill in event it is to pass, and now I want to speak of the policy of the proposed legislation. I do not believe it is wise to make all public roads and highways post-routes. We now have the service on 215,000 miles of post-routes at a cost of nearly $7,000,000 per annum for transportation alone; in the main it is an excellent service, but subject no doubt to some abuses, but here is a proposition to enable the Postmaster-General in the exercise of his discretion to put the service on any of the three or four million of miles of roads in the United States. There would be no objection to this power if the service is not put on routes where it is unnecessary; or in other words, if the Postmaster-General is not influenced by false information, favoritism, or the pertinacity of those wielding political influence, or those who have the granting of the money to pay for the service, to put the service on routes where it is not in fact required for the benefit of the public.

The ordinary common carriers of the country do business for the revenues they can derive therefrom, and the question with them is, will the proposed service pay? But the Post-Office Department, spending in round numbers $40,000,000 per annum, is a machine of the Government and is conducted not only for the revenues it will yield, but for the accommodation of the whole people, and within certain limits for the development of the country. In the very nature of things, guard the necessary discretion of the executive officers as you will, and in many instances, from the want of knowledge or from the persistence of those desiring service, this discretion will be unwisely exercised in the future as I have no doubt in many instances it has been in the past. Hence, I think this enlargement of the power and discretion of the Postmaster-General by the wholesale is not wise. It no doubt will be replied that post-routes are now established from year to year upon the request of Members and Senators by their insertion in "post-route bills." This is true, yet I have no doubt the mere necessity of establishing these routes from year to year by law keeps much useless or extravagant service from being established.

To show the impolicy of the proposed extension of the discretion of the Postmaster-General I will refer to a single circumstance. At the last session of Congress after the estimates had been made by the Department and the money appropriated by Congress for the postal service, two thousand new post-routes were established, and very soon after the 1st of July service was put upon thirteen hundred of these new routes. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who exercises the discretion as to the necessity for service on all these routes, upon being asked about it a few days ago, said in referring to this new service: "We put an immense amount of service on. Everybody"—referring to members of Congress—"who came up to the bureau and said that service ought to be put on, had it put on for him. I presume the gentlemen knew what they needed."

Now, I do not say that this service was unnecessary in whole or part, but I do say that if the service is to be put on all routes in the future merely upon the request of gentlemen, whether they be members of Congress or not, that with this bill enacted into law the service will go upon routes with greater facility than routes are now established by our ordinary post-route bills. I am not seeking to lecture members or upbraid myself for service that may have been put on upon my request in my district, but my observation teaches me that members of Congress generally ask not only for mail service, but for almost anything else that is requested by persons in their districts. We have to take things as we find them, and in view of all these matters I do not believe it is wise to further enlarge the discretion or power of the Postmaster-General in the premises.

Mr. COOK. I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STONE.]

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, I think, has not been unmindful of that clause of the Constitution to which the gentleman from Illinois has referred, to wit: that Congress shall have power to establish post-routes. Now, the present question is this, if Congress has the power to establish post-routes, it seems to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that Congress has the power to make all public highways post-roads. The same authority which gave the last session of this Congress power to establish two thousand post-routes, gives to this session power to say that every public highway in the United States shall be a post-route. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing so very remarkable or new in this legislation. Already the rule for establishing post-routes has been largely extended. By section 3964 of the Revised Statutes the following are established as post-roads.

SEC. 3964. All the waters of the United States, during the time the mail is carried thereon.
All railroads or parts of railroads which are now or hereafter may be in operation.
All canals, during the time the mail is carried thereon.
All plank-roads during the time the mail is carried thereon.
The road on which the mail is carried to supply any court-house which may be without a mail, and the road on which the mail is carried under contract made by the Postmaster-General for extending the line of posts to supply mails to post-offices not on any established route, during the time such mail is carried thereon.
All letter-carrier routes established in any city or town for the collection and delivery of mail matters.

Now, as is well known here, a great part of the time of the members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and of the members of this House is taken up in this routine duty in reference to the work of preparing and reporting a bill for the establishment of post-routes, a bill containing not one word of general legislation, but from one to four thousand post-routes. In the first session of this Congress two thousand of these routes were established and service placed upon thirteen hundred of them.

It is well known to be a fact that the establishment of a post-route does not provide for the expenditure of one dollar of the public money. Discretion still rests with the Postmaster-General to establish service upon the route or not.

Section 3965 provides:

The Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law, as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper.

The present bill if enacted into a law will not in any way change or affect this statute. It will still be at the discretion of the Postmaster-General to say whether service shall be placed upon the routes or not.

Now, it seems to me that there can be no force in the point made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] that the city or township officers will not have power to change or alter the highways if they are all declared to be post-routes. The statutes virtually provide that these officers have now the power to change a given highway which is a post-route. It seems to me if this is true the same power will be in the officer to change and alter highways if all the public roads are declared to be post-routes. Now, as to the general policy is there any objection or would the gentleman from Illinois urge any objection to the General Government having jurisdiction and extending its power over all of the highways in this country for the purpose of postal routes, and extending the facilities of the Post-Office Department in creating new post-offices? What is the practice? At present if a request is made upon my friend to have a post-office established in a given township in his district it becomes necessary for him, and it is the uniform practice, to inform his constituents that the given town is not on any established post-route, and there must be a bill introduced to establish the post-route.

He is requested to do this. As a matter of practice, I suppose, he always does it. I suppose all members introduce these bills as formal matters. I know our committee-room is crowded with petitions of this kind and with requests of this nature. The bill is reported; if there be no opposition it passes. That is then a post-route, but not a dollar of public money will be expended unless the Postmaster-General sees fit to expend money on the road in the postal service.

Now, if this bill becomes a law all this will be done away with. We will go at once to the Postmaster-General and request service to be placed between a given post-office and another post-office to be named. Instead of requiring legislation to establish the post-route, he will direct his attention to the question whether the public interest requires this postal service to be placed upon this road. It seems to me that this is in the interest of extending the star service in this country. There is no difficulty in supplying the mails upon railroads and highways leading to country towns; but there is much difficulty and hinderance and embarrassment even in establishing mail facilities into the newer regions of the country West and South, that portion of the country which is being developed; and it seems to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that it is in the interest of the general public to provide that all highways may be established as post-roads, for the purpose of enabling the Postmaster-General to place this service upon them in his discretion.

I concede, and that is the strongest argument, if it is one that can be made against this bill, although it seems to me that it cannot be urged with any force, that to a certain degree it may extend the discretion of the Postmaster-General. In other words, he is not obliged to await the formal action of Congress in the establishment of a post-route. Nothing more than this, it seems to me, can be said against the bill.

Mr. COOK. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I regret that a measure which I deem of so much importance to the people of this country should not have been presented to this House at a time when the discussion of it could be ample, so that the House might have that information upon it which is necessary in order that it may act wisely. Gentlemen have seen fit in the discussion of this matter up to this time, in this House and outside of it, to treat it from a theoretical point of view as to what is the operation of the postal laws in the eye of a lawyer; but they have failed thus far to discuss it from that practical stand-point which is obtained from observing the administration of this service for years past. In the brief time allotted to me I trust I may be able to present something for the consideration of the House in this matter.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat has rightly stated that the railways of the country were made post-roads, that the steamboats of the country were made post-roads, and that plank-roads in certain contingencies were made post-roads. That is true with this limitation: while they are post-roads, they are limited by the appropriations made for this service. There is safety in this system; because when you undertake to pay a railroad company there is no cheat about it; you pay according to the weight of the mails. So likewise in reference to the steamboat service. There are certain sums appropriated, and the service is limited by the appropriations made. The gradual abandonment of the steamboat service for years past makes it of the less importance.

But when you come to the star service, the case is different. You do not there pay for the service as you get it. You are paying, for instance, for a route from Vinita, Indian Territory, to Las Vegas, New Mexico, at a rate commencing at $6,000 and running up to $150,000; and you do not know, and the Postmaster-General at this hour cannot tell you, and has not been able to furnish the Committee on Appropriations even the number of post-offices on the road, and he cannot tell us the receipts of a single office. This is the wild method in which the public moneys are expended. But because some gentlemen may see fit in the interest of the public Treasury to raise a protest against it, another sees fit to thrust himself forward and announce to the American people that he regrets that the railroads and steamboats and the large contractors are having their way, and that the people's service is to be stricken down.

I say, therefore, Mr. Speaker, while the question as to railroads and steamboats may be a proper object for discretion, yet when you come to the star routes in which the revenues do not begin to approach the expenditures there is safety in keeping this matter in our own power.

But, sir, gentlemen have seen fit further to tell you that the Postmaster-General now has the power to put the service wherever he pleases, whether there is a post-route or not. This I deny. The statutes provide that between points where there are post-offices he may put on temporary service, and when Congress assembles he shall notify Congress of his action. He is restrained, therefore, by that provision of the law. What is the proposition now? It is to make every highway of this country a post-road. Gentlemen tell you there is no danger in this; that it is a mere matter of discretion; that the Postmaster-General may put the service on or not, and that he is still held in check by the appropriations. Let us, as I said at the outset, discuss the matter as practical men and in the interest of the people of this country who have to bear these burdens. Why, sir, we are told that the Postmaster-General has been going on increasing the star service at a rate which if kept up will bring about a deficiency of $2,000,000, but that as regards that service he has acted inside of the law. We are told that the way he gets inside of the law is by striking down the service necessary for the interests of the country. We are told that having made enormous increases on certain routes in the Territories, by striking down the star service in the States and Territories, to use his own language, by a Cæsarian operation, he gets inside of the law.

According to the construction of that Department, as at present administered, the Postmaster-General may put postal service on every highway to an extent that will use up all the appropriations for that service within thirty days, and keep inside the law. And yet gentlemen tell us that he is restrained by the appropriations.

There is one other thing I desire to state. I must be brief in what I say. Let us see how this matter has been accomplished. We have been told heretofore that while this has been done, it has been done in the interest of the South, where the service has been increased. We are now told outside that the object is to build up the service. Members of Congress go to the Department and ask to have service put on certain routes, and they are told they cannot get it, but will have to wait until Congress shall pass a post-route bill.

Now, while gentlemen may not regard it as strictly within the line of legitimate discussion of this bill, I desire to call the attention of members to the fact that under this grandiloquent effort to build up the service in the South we have a threatened deficiency of $2,000,000.

What has been the increase in the Southern States? By reference to the authorities I find that in the State of Delaware there has been an increased expenditure of $243; in the State of West Virginia there has been an increased expenditure of a little over $2,000; in Maryland, $2,671; Virginia, $4,421; North Carolina, $1,948; South Carolina, $3,421; Georgia, $12,650. That is about the rate of increase—less than $100,000—for all the Southern States except Texas. Yet southern men here are asked to vote away the people's money by the million in order that they may have $4,000 or $5,000 additional postal service for their States.

I desire to call attention to this fact and to beg my friends here to call a halt in regard to this subject until we shall have an opportunity to present to this House the facts connected with the administration of the Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. KENNA.) The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire a moment or two more.

Mr. COOK. I will yield to the gentleman for two minutes more.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have alluded to this fact simply for the purpose of showing that the Department has gone on increasing this service beyond what Congress ever intended it should be, and the only limit we now have is in regard to the matter of establishing post-routes. Under the provisions of this bill it is proposed to open up the whole subject throughout the whole country, and not require the Postmaster-General to report to Congress, but leave him to go on doing as he has done, ignoring the action of previous Congresses and coming to this one and saying: "I knew that laws were passed to restrain me, but I have ignored the action of your dignified body of 293 members, relying on my efforts hereafter to get another Congress to sustain me in my illegal transactions."

If we pass this bill you will simply multiply the opportunities for this sort of thing. I beg this House not in this way and at this time to increase the number of post-routes. Let us at least postpone the subject until we can have ample time for its discussion.

Mr. COOK. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY,] the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. MONEY. This bill which my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] calls a grandiloquent bill has just one line in it. It is the shortest bill that was ever introduced into this House. It provides "that all public roads and highways are hereby declared post-roads." That is all there is in the bill.

The speech of the gentleman from Georgia is clear outside of the question; it has nothing whatever to do with it. He has been discussing the methods of administration by the Post-Office Department, and he has read certain figures to show the improper expenditure of the public money of that Department.

Now this bill is intended to relieve this House from the labor of yearly preparing and passing bills to establish new post-roads, and from the expense of printing such bills. That is all there is in it. There is nothing connected with this bill to give the Postmaster-General any chance whatever to increase the expenditure for this service. It leaves that matter just as it is to-day. There is no increase of power whatever given him, nor is there anything in the bill giving power upon the subject.

It simply is a provision that the bills heretofore introduced and passed as matters of form, without debate, without discussion, without any examination whatever by the members of the House generally, shall be passed at once in this comprehensive way simply to avoid trouble.

I can appreciate the effort of some gentlemen to defeat this bill, because they may be anxious to identify themselves with every little matter connected with their district. They do not want anything done here for the benefit of their district unless they can have their own sign-manual impressed upon it. They desire to be able to tell their people that whatever they have comes through them directly and in no other way.

The general discussion upon this bill by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] does not touch the real object of the bill. We know to-day that there are hundreds and thousands of post-routes which have been established by law upon which there is no postal service and never will be. We know that there are thousands and thousands of miles of navigable rivers upon which there is no postal service whatever, and perhaps never will be.

This bill does not give any new opening for fraud or increase of expenditures on the part of the executive department; none whatever. The bill is as plain and simple as can be; its purpose is simply what I have stated. Gentlemen may say what they please about the manner of administering the laws on this subject; let them go on.

I listen to them with pleasure; I might possibly indorse what is said on this particular point, but it is entirely inappropriate to this discussion. The effort seems to be to confuse the mind of Congress and log-roll this question with other things which have no connection with the bill and can have none.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will pass this bill. It comes here with the unanimons recommendation of the committee over which I have the honor to preside, and it contains nothing whatever to justify the apprehensions which gentlemen have expressed.

Mr. DUNNELL. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I would like to ask him a question. Who is to determine whether a given piece of road is a public highway or not?

Mr. MONEY. I suppose that any road which is under the care of a county or a State for the purpose of being kept up for the convenience of travel is a public highway or a public road.

Mr. DUNNELL. Well, sir, a great many roads in the West have been made by combination among the people for their own convenience; they have no legal existence at all. Under the operation of the present laws for the creation of post-roads we may have the mail carried over these unauthorized highways; but under this bill the question may be raised in the Post-Office Department whether a road between A and B is or is not a public highway; and if that question be raised, shall we be under the necessity of establishing that road as a public highway according to law?

Mr. MONEY. This bill will not in such a case give rise to any difficulty that does not arise under the present law. If it be necessary, such a road can be declared a post-road just as has been done heretofore. We now pass laws every year establishing post-roads, and under these laws the Postmaster-General acts. If this bill be passed, he can still act under such laws.

Mr. COOK. I yield two minutes of my time to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, the number of post-roads made every year in our post-route bills is almost countless. Upon the request of any member of this House and, for aught I know, of any outsider, any route which seems to be necessary is inserted in the bill as a post-road. There has never been any complaint in regard to this practice. Now I have found in my experience (and I presume that the experience of other members is the same) that where post-roads established by law may run for a long distance parallel to each other, the introduction of a railroad in the vicinity has necessitated the establishment of new post-roads, crossing routes already established, and which were formerly sufficient. This occurs almost every day in the newer portions of our Western States. I have had five cases of this kind presented to me this very winter. I have been compelled to come and ask the committee to authorize new post-roads between points where post-roads are already established, but in different directions and in a roundabout way.

The passage of this bill will enable the Post-Office Department to shorten routes all over the country, to dispense with many routes already established, thus economizing expenditures and at the same time satisfying better the wants of the people.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. CONGER. I am allowed but two minutes. The gentleman may talk afterward.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The two minutes of the gentleman from Michigan have expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I beg pardon of the gentleman for occupying a second or two of his time.

Mr. CONGER. I am sorry that the gentleman, after having spoken half an hour, should have captured the last half minute of my two minutes.

Mr. COOK. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.]

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I have been obliged to be absent from the House during the greater part of this discussion, and possibly what I wish to say has been said more forcibly by others.

Under the ordinary course of administration I might not apprehend danger from so wide a grant of postal routes as this bill proposes. But when I hear an Assistant Postmaster-General of the United States say that whenever new post-routes are created it is his right and his duty to put service upon them, notwithstanding the limitation of the amount appropriated by law, that because a number of post-roads have been established (and here every public road and highway in the country is made a post-road) he has the right, in advance of any appropriation by the law-making power, to exceed by millions the appropriations actually made—I hesitate to put any such power in the hands of the Post-Office Department as now administered. Where there is a bold and open defiance of law based upon the fact that post-roads have been established—when it is proclaimed that this matter rests upon the will or discretion of an Assistant Postmaster-General, I submit to the House whether it is wise for us to commit such a trust to a Department thus administrated. If such a bill as this be passed, I foresee that during the very next fiscal year, instead of there being used for the star service $5,500,000, the amount which Congress appropriated to be used during this year, we shall have ten or twelve million dollars used for this purpose under the arbitrary will of the Assistant Postmaster-General of the United States.

I am perfectly willing that Congress should judge of this condition of affairs for itself; but being cognizant of the facts I have stated, I have felt it my duty to give the House warning. If in the next fiscal year the expense of the star service increases from nearly $7,000,000, as it is now, to $14,000,000, the responsibility will lie with this House, not with me.

Mr. COOK. I will yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DIBRELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that gentlemen who are opposing this bill are straining at a gnat and attempting to swallow a camel. Every mail-route which has been established and of which they are complaining has been established by act of Congress, every one of them. It has been shown that at the last session of Congress there were established two thousand additional post-routes, and that on some thirteen hundred of them mail service has been put. If there has been any fraud perpetrated on the officials of the Government in this regard, that is no reason why we should not have this bill established making all roads and highways post-routes.

Now, every gentleman here knows you can go to the clerk of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and have a post-route established from any one place to any other place, from this city to the moon even, and not a single member of this House would inquire about it, and the general post-route bill including it would come in and no member here would inquire where the routes began or where they ended. It has not been customary to do so, but the establishment of these routes has been taken for granted from year to year.

Now, sir, under the star-route service every steamboat in the United States is entitled to carry the mails. The Postmaster-General, under existing law, can put the service on every boat upon every river and every lake in the United States without any restriction whatsoever. Still these gentlemen opposing the pending bill say we should not put it upon all public roads and highways.

When these post-routes are established by act of Congress, the practice of the Post-Office Department is to send out inquiry to the postmaster at each end of the route as to whether the mail service is necessary or not. If the answer is made in the affirmative then mail service is put upon that route. They also send out inquiries to know how many families will be supplied by mail service upon a particular route, and other inquiries of a like character. Of course great discretion is given to the Postmaster-General in placing service upon post-routes, and it is only right that it should be so. The Post-Office Department does not pretend to put service on all routes established by Congress until after inquiry has been made whether it is for the good of the public service that the mails shall be placed upon any particular route. If the Government has been swindled in this respect, as has been alleged here upon this floor, we must recollect that the act establishing these post-routes was an act passed by Congress. In reference to every one of these post-routes it has been established by act of Congress, and mail service put on it only after proper inquiries instituted by the Post-Office Department. Now, whether the postmasters at each end recommended the establishment of each one of these post-routes or not, I do not know and do not care; but I do say that it is economy on the part of Congress to pass this bill making all our public roads and highways post-routes.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] argued in substance that by establishing all our public roads and highways as post-routes the Government of the United States took control of them. That is mere nonsense. Every turnpike in the United States and all public ferries will charge those carrying public mails just like individuals, and they will have the right to charge them as individuals are charged. Therefore the argument made by the gentleman from Illinois is not at all applicable to this case. I hope the House will pass the bill.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple bill and ought to commend itself to the consideration of this House. Very much of the argument used in opposition to it has no reference to it at all. Whatever frauds have been practiced on the Post-Office Department, or whatever villainy has been perpetrated and practiced on the Treasury Department, or whatever villainy has been perpetrated in the Post-Office Department has been done under laws creating specific mail-routes and does not apply to this proposition at all.

As to the constitutional objection urged by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that Congress alone has power to establish post-routes, let me refer to an act for which he voted:

SEC. 3964. The following are established post-routes:

All the waters of the United States, during the time the mail is carried thereon.

All railroads or parts of railroads which are now or hereafter may be in operation.

All canals, during the time mail is carried thereon.

All plank-roads during the time the mail is carried thereon.

The road on which the mail is carried to supply any court-house which may be without a mail, and the road on which the mail is carried under contract made by the Postmaster-General for extending the line of posts to supply mails to post-offices not on any established route, during the time such mail is carried thereon.

All letter-carrier routes established in any city or town for the collection and delivery of mail matters.

In 1872 the gentleman was here and, I presume, voted for that law.

I wish to say furthermore whatever fraud or wrong or villainy has been discovered, it has been long known and was discussed by the chairman of this committee years ago, as having been perpetrated under laws creating special post-routes.

I wish to say another thing. At the last session of Congress, over two thousand mail-routes upon which star service was to be placed were established by law, and the Postmaster-General so far has ordered service on about thirteen hundred of them. Some in my district are still without service. There is scarcely a district that is not without service. We have five hundred petitions to establish new post-routes, and when we report a bill in favor of them, I apprehend, as has been the custom heretofore, no man will rise to object to its passage, nor can any objection be raised to it.

This does not increase the power of the Postmaster-General or give him any facility for the perpetration of fraud, should he wish to practice any, which does not already exist by law.

The great expenditure and great extravagance of the Post-Office Department have been in the free mail delivery and large railroad contracts. The city banker, sitting in his office, can have his mail delivered to him twice a day. The rich man, in his gown and slippers, too lazy to walk two hundred yards in the snow to the post-office for his mail, has it delivered to him at his door twice a day; while the poor man living out in the country far in the interior, in the mountain recesses or valleys, ten, fifteen, or twenty miles from a post-office, has to get his mail in the best way he can through his neighbors or otherwise.

The extension of railroads through this country has changed the public highways to a great extent. I know of a dozen or more little post-offices established at cross-roads and stores which have been removed to the railroads.

I now demand the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to ask a question——

Mr. COOK. I decline to yield. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I only wish to ask the gentleman if it is proposed to apply this to public highways to be hereafter made?

Mr. COOK. Yes, it is.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the statute touching railroads, which says, "all railroads or parts of railroads which are now or hereafter may be in operation."

Mr. COOK. I call for the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

Mr. TUCKER. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will allow me to offer an amendment to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. COOK. I am not authorized by the committee to do otherwise than to demand the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then I move that the bill be recommitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I think that the bill ought to be recommitted for amendment.

The question recurred upon ordering the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 50.

Mr. CLYMER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COOK and Mr. CANNON of Illinois, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 44.

Mr. CLYMER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make the point of order that the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed to the consideration of the report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for the purpose of presenting a resolution in reference to printing some reports in contested-election cases.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield for that purpose.

PRINTING OF REPORTS—CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be authorized to cause the reports of sub-committees of that committee in reference to contested-election cases pending before them to be printed for the use of the committee.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the report of the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE VIII.

1. Every member shall be present within the hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented; and shall vote on each question put, unless, on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll-call and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I stated on yesterday afternoon that I had an amendment which I proposed to offer in my own right, and not by the authority of the Committee on Rules. After careful comparison between that and the one that is proposed to be offered by the gentleman from Virginia I have determined not to submit my amendment, but to yield for the present to him.

Mr. TUCKER. I move the following amendment to be marked No. 2 of Rule VIII.

The CHAIRMAN. We have not yet reached the second clause of that rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman, as I understand it, offers this clause to come immediately after No. 1 of Rule VIII and to be No. 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule VIII by inserting after clause 1 the following:

2. Whenever a quorum fails to vote on any question, and objection is made for that cause, there shall be a call of the House, and the yeas and nays on the pending question shall at the same time be ordered. The Clerk shall call the roll, and each member as he answers to his name, or is brought before the House under the proceedings of the call of the House, shall vote on the pending question. If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote shall together make a majority of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted; and the pending question shall be decided as the majority of those voting shall appear.

Mr. TUCKER. The purpose of the amendment I propose is very obvious. It is to prevent that which we have very often seen in this House and which has occurred very often in preceding Congresses, and I offer the amendment without reference to its partisan influence in any direction, but it is to prevent the non-action of the House when a quorum is actually present.

Mr. SIMONTON. Let the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. TUCKER. A majority of the members of this House if present constitute a quorum to do business. The Constitution does not say that a majority voting shall constitute a quorum, but that a majority of the House shall constitute a quorum to do business; and the practice of the English Parliament, from which most of our rules upon this subject have been taken, is that whenever the House of Commons meets the speaker counts the members who are present and announces that a quorum is present if there is a sufficient number: so that the speaker of the House of Commons may, as the Speaker here, by ocular demonstration become satisfied that there is a quorum present. And the purpose of this amendment is not to make any member vote when he does not choose to vote, but to have a call of the House when a quorum is disclosed as not present upon a division on a pending question; and then, as each member's name is called and he answers to his name, he is noted as present. He may vote or not, as he pleases. If he does not answer to his name the Sergeant-at-Arms under the call is sent for him; if he is in the House he is brought to the bar, and by ocular demonstration is proved to be present. And thus we may have an ascertained quorum of the House though there may not be a quorum voting.

If you will look at the debates on the Federal Constitution on this subject, you will find that the only danger the framers of that Constitution apprehended was the action of less than a majority of the House when more than a majority were absent from the House; but there was no apprehension expressed in the debates and no apprehension felt that there would be any action by a majority of those voting if there were enough present to constitute a majority of the House. And so, sir, all of our rules have looked to the question of present and absent members.

If a member is not present the Sergeant-at-Arms is sent for the absent member. When brought in he is present and though he may not choose to vote, as a number of gentlemen do not choose to vote on questions that come before the House, that does not destroy the action of the House. The amendment does not require a quorum to be present to make a decision of the House valid, but it only requires there shall be a quorum present to enable the majority to decide upon a question.

If the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] be correct in the statement he made the other day that there must be a majority acting upon a question, the effect would be this: under our Constitution no measure could pass against a dissenting minority unless a majority of the whole House voted for the measure; because all that a minority has to do in the House upon any measure is to remain silent, and if they do not by voting disclose the fact that they are present the argument would be that if there is not a quorum voting on the question it is lost, or there can be no decision.

Thai, sir, would result in this conclusion: that unless a majority of the whole House voted for any measure to which there was a minority dissenting it could not pass the House. There are a great many of the State constitutions to which an amendment of this kind has been made that there shall be a majority of the whole House to pass a bill. But that is not the provision of the Federal Constitution. It is simply that a majority shall constitute a quorum, and then the decision of a question shall be by the majority of that majority.

I have offered this amendment, as I have said, not from any partisan stand-point, and I mean no disrespect to anybody, and I feel no gentleman on the other side will charge me with disrespect toward them; but it seems to me not to be in accordance with the progress of the age we live in that we should sit here in a condition of non-action under the self-delusion we are not present when we are present, and that there shall be a power on the part of gentlemen here upon any question of remaining silent and saying, "You cannot prove I am here unless I choose to open my mouth."

Mr. PAGE. Let the amendment be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been reported twice, but if there be no objection it will be read again.

There was no objection, and the amendment was again read

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that this proposition is offered as a part of a body of rules that we have all with great unanimity expressed our desire to see enacted into the formal rules of the House. I should have greatly preferred that the Committee of the Whole, following the example of the Committee on Rules, would have left out controverted and certainly partisan questions from any part of this codification. It was in deference to that spirit that precisely this amendment was not pressed even to a vote in the Committee on Rules when we had the subject under consideration, although there were members of the Committee who desired just such a rule as this.

I call attention to the first phase of the question, and ask my friend from Virginia, without any regard to its partisan bearing, to see into what a strange and vague condition this House would be left if this were adopted. Whenever the question arises whether there is a quorum or not present, it is to be determined according to what he calls "ocular demonstration." The chairman of the Committee of the Whole or the Speaker of the House is to see with his own eyes that there is a quorum present. Who is to control his seeing? How do we know but that he may see forty members more for his own purposes than there are here in the House? And what protection have gentleman if the Speaker says he sees a quorum if he cannot convert that seeing into a list of names on the call of the roll by the Clerk?

I think my friend from Virginia will see that he lets in the one-man power in a far more dangerous way than ever has occurred before in any legislative assembly of which he and I have any knowledge.

Mr. TUCKER. I will ask my friend if the Speaker does not now count upon a rising vote?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, but we always have the opportunity to correct that count by means of a new count by tellers appointed from both sides. And even then, before anything can pass, we can have the yeas and nays taken, and the names of those voting recorded.

Aside from the insuperable objection that I have raised to this proposition, as a thing that ought not to be tried because of its vagueness, its uncertainty, and the danger that members of the House may be imposed upon by an unscrupulous Speaker that may come hereafter—I say that aside from all that, and beyond all that, I ask members to consider one fact: This has been a House of Representatives since 1789. This House has been the theater of all sorts of political storms and tempests. We have lived through the times of great wars, of a great civil war, when there were excitements hardly paralleled in the history of parliamentary annals. Yet during all these years no man before, so far as I know, no party before has ever thought it necessary to introduce a rule that gives the power of declaring the presence of members by the single voice of one person; a power that will enable him to bring from his sick-bed a dying man and put him down in this Hall, so that the Speaker shall count him, and make his presence against his will, and perhaps in his delirium, count in order to make a quorum, so that some partisan measure may be carried out over the body of that dying man.

Sir, the moment you get over the line, the moment you cross the boundary of names, the moment you leap over the iron fence of the roll, that moment you are out in the vague, and all sorts of disorders may come in.

My friend refers to the rule of the House of Commons, where it requires only forty men out of six hundred and seventy or six hundred and eighty to constitute a quorum.

Mr. TUCKER. But they have to be counted by the speaker.

Mr. GARFIELD. Forty men under the eye of the speaker of the House of Commons present no sort of analogy on which to found a rule for us in a House of less than three hundred members and where it requires one hundred and fifty to make a quorum. I hope my friend from Virginia will not press his proposition to a conclusion as a part of the body of our rules, for we shall be compelled to oppose it with all our might.

Mr. BLACKBURN and Mr. SPRINGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] a member of the Committee on Rules, as entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he has no doubt there will be an opportunity for all members to be heard upon so important a proposition as the one now pending.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I should make no objection on behalf of the Committee on Rules to a continuation of the discussion upon this question, as it is one of considerable importance.

Mr. HAWLEY. Without the formality of moving to strike out the last word?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly. I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] whom I know to be well versed in parliamentary law, for I have learned that from intimate association with him as a member of the Committee on Rules, should have taken the position that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] tends to violate all precedents by placing in the hands of one man a power unknown to deliberative bodies. Does not the gentleman from Ohio know that in the present existing rules of this House, as well as that proposed revision which he, as a very efficient member of the Committee on Rules, has submitted for your adoption, supplemented and supported by parliamentary law from the older countries and also by practice both in England and America, always and everywhere the power has been recognized and vested in the Speaker or presiding officer to make an actual count of the persons present? I will read from Cushing's Digest of Parliamentary Law, accepted the world over as authority, in which it is provided—

> If, therefore, it appears upon division, or if notice is taken by any member, that a quorum is not present, it then becomes the immediate duty of the presiding officer to count the members, and if they do not amount to a quorum to suspend all further proceedings.

That is the authority laid down by Mr. Cushing. The present rule so recognizes it, and makes it the Speaker's duty. The proposed rule of the House, if amended as proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, instead of consolidating power in the hands of one man, takes it from him, and requires a call of the House to be had, and only those persons present noted that either respond to their names upon the call of the roll, or appear at the bar of the House in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Now, I will not be unfair enough to fail or refuse to do credit and justice to the republican members of the Committee on Rules for the manner in which they comported themselves when this question was raised during the deliberations of that committee. I do not mean to cavil or clamor against the opposition which one or both of them may offer to this amendment on this floor. But I do say that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia does not go as far as many of the States in the rules of their legislative bodies have gone. It does not direct that a member refusing to vote shall be recorded as voting in the negative. When a member refuses to answer to his name—a duty made imperative by existing rule which says that he shall vote unless he be excused—the amendment of my friend from Virginia simply provides that when a member shall fail to discharge this duty imposed upon him by the highest obligation he can possibly bear, an obligation made imperative by the plain language of the rule—when refusing to discharge such a duty, he shall not be reported or recorded as voting at all, but his presence shall be noted in order to prevent the absence of a quorum.

I do not mean to commit myself to the theory that there should be no power given to a minority to impede or obstruct legislation. I know that there are times and occasions upon which I would not abridge that power if I were able. Where the right to offer amendments has been denied, where reasonable opportunity for debate has been refused to the minority, it is not only their right but it is their duty to obstruct such legislation. It matters not whether I stand here with the majority or with the minority, I shall always advocate and demand that right. But I say the report submitted by this committee is not, upon any fair construction, amenable to the criticism that it is its purpose, even as supplemented by the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, to abridge in any material respect the right that the minority should hold in this House. Take this revision, adopt it as a whole, and incorporate in it the amendment now pending, and the minority will still be amply provided with every facility to obstruct and impede legislation where debate has been refused and the right of amendment denied.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, the introduction of this proposition cannot give ground to any particular political charge against either party. For many years gentlemen upon the other side of the House have availed themselves of the power which is sought here to be circumscribed. At times this power has been exercised almost daily. It never entered into the mind of the gentleman from Kentucky or the gentleman from Virginia that such a rule as this would be either constitutional or proper. Remarks made upon the question in this Hall from year to year will justify this assertion. I do not believe that a just construction of the Constitution would authorize the adoption of this proposition.

If I looked merely to party effect—if I looked to a time when I would like to have such a rule as this to hold down the unruly democracy, as I have in former years desired to have such a rule—I would to-day join the gentleman from Virginia (if I thought it right) in advocating and voting for this rule; I would endure it for this session and the next session; and thereafter, during the long years of republican control which are coming, I would enforce it in this House upon the malcontents on the other side.

But, sir, while the Constitution declares what shall constitute a quorum to do business in this House, this rule declares that when there shall be ascertained by one man a quorum present, a rule shall do the business of the House, a rule shall legislate, a rule shall determine the voice and wish of the Representatives of the people; so that on the passage of a bill, although there may be but fifteen voting in the affirmative and five in the negative, yet by virtue of this rule, if there be a majority present by compulsion or otherwise, the bill shall be declared passed on the vote pro and con of but twenty members. Does the great expounder of the State of Virginia claim that such a result would be arrived at by any constitutional means?

Sir, I in common with every member of this House demand that there shall be a public exhibition of presence—a public record of votes; that there shall be tellers; that there shall be yeas and nays; that the yeas and nays shall determine how you and I and every other member of this House may have voted and would vote.

The point made by my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is a good one—that we are committing to the Speaker of this House or the chairman of the Committee of the Whole the right first to determine who are present and to determine when there is a quorum. It is useless to say that there may not be times when in such an emergency as would require the exercise of this power the presiding officer would not be partisan. Shakespeare foretold this when in one of his plays he said:

Get thee glass eyes;
And, like a scurvy politician, seem
To see the things you dost not.

Such politicians will come here on either or any side. The force of circumstances, the impetuous passions of members which would produce such an occasion, will influence men to see that which they see not, with or without "glass eyes."

I have no fear that this amendment will be adopted in this House, because it would be wrong in itself; it would be unconstitutional; it would be violently partisan. I have no fear that the fair-minded men of this House on either side will adopt so violent and partisan a measure.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] both assume that the question of the presence of a quorum depends upon the count to be made by the Speaker. That is not the purport of the rule submitted by the gentleman from Virginia. It provides that when a quorum does not vote upon any question the yeas and nays shall be called, and if a majority do not answer upon that call of the yeas and nays, there shall be immediately a call of the House, and as each member appears, in pursuance of the order of the House for his arrest, and is brought before the bar of the House, he shall be recorded as present. He is here and answers before the whole House for his presence upon the call of his name.

Mr. TUCKER. My friend will allow me to correct him. The call of the House is contemporaneous with the call of the yeas and nays on the pending question.

Mr. SPRINGER. So I understand.

Mr. TUCKER. So that when a member's name is called, if he answer to his name he shows by auricular demonstration that he is present. If he does not answer, he can be brought before the House by the Sergeant-at-Arms; and if he then votes his name is recorded.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Michigan has stated that this rule is unconstitutional and partisan in its character. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, it is neither. One of the greatest absurdities imaginable to me is this: it is within the power of a less number of members than a quorum of this House to issue a mandate and send it to the Pacific coast, to the far-off State of Oregon, to bring in a member to this body, and when we have got him here at an expense of weeks of time and thousands of dollars, the man is not here at last unless he voluntarily opens his mouth and says "I am here"—and votes "ay" or "no" on the pending question. I say there can be no greater absurdity than to presume our fathers made a constitution and gave that power to a less number than a quorum, and after we have exhausted it the man was not here at last unless he chose to be. He did not choose to be here or we would not have sent for him, and when he is brought here he is not here unless he chooses to be. What an absurdity.

Now, what does the Constitution say? Section 5, article 1, says:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business.

A majority shall constitute a quorum to do business. That majority do not vote, but they must be here. If the majority is here the quorum is here, and if by the rules of the House we have determined that fact, then we are a majority ready for business. How do we determine that fact? Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. Therefore, if we have determined by the rules of our proceedings that a quorum is to be ascertained in this way, then a quorum is here, the majority is here and ready for business.

Therefore you will find from this provision of the Constitution, Mr. Chairman, that a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and it is authorized to compel the attendance of absent members. If we may compel the attendance of absent members what virtue is there in this provision of the Constitution at all; what use is it to us unless it is, as my friend from North Carolina says, to compel them to be here to constitute a quorum? What is this constitutional provision for? What is it worth in the Constitution if, after having been exercised, it amounts to nothing at last and the man is not here? I wish to say by our legislative system, from its analogy to the British system, our fathers understood that when this power was exercised the man was here, and all we have to do is to recognize that fact.

If you will turn to Mr. Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies you will find this provision laid down in reference to the House of Commons:

When, upon a division, it appears a quorum is not present, the question upon which such division occurs ordinarily remains undecided; but where the aggregate of votes on either side, with the tellers and with the Speaker, makes up a quorum, the question is decided.

By the British constitution and by the rules of the House of Commons, when there does not appear to be a quorum on the vote, but when the tellers are taken into consideration who do not vote, and when the speaker is taken into consideration, whose presence is known, there then is a quorum, the question is decided. That is the law of the House of Commons.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on the pending question. So far as this debate has gone, it has been free, I believe, from all partisan character. The committee on Rules set out with a view to have harmony of action. We need reform in the rules. Our first resolution in that Committee was to recommend nothing which did not have the unanimous sanction of every member of the committee, with the right reserved to each member to object in the House, if he should choose to do so.

Now, the pending question is an old one. It is to compel members present to vote. The gentleman who has just taken his seat, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] asks what is the Constitution worth unless the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] is adopted? The rule as reported by the committee is as it was made by the founders of our Government. The Constitution has been in existence for over three-quarters of a century and the Government carried on all the time under this rule as reported and without the proposed amendment. Am I now to answer him by telling him what the Constitution without the proposed amendment is worth? Why, sir, what has been done without it! What grand achievements have been accomplished without it—accomplished under the rule as reported by the committee! What grander achievements may not yet be accomplished under it without the proposed amendment!

Whatever has been done has all been done under this rule as it stands and as our committee recommend it shall remain. That rule has been the rule of this House I think since the First Congress. There have been divers attempts to amend it to make members vote whether they will or not. You have the right to bring them into the House, but no House has ever yet adopted any measure to punish a member for not voting. One distinguished Speaker of the House once said: "You may bring a horse to water, but you cannot make him drink."

I think we had better leave the rule just as it is. All parties since the beginning of the Government have occasionally, when in a minority, absented themselves to break up a quorum and thus prevent the passage of an obnoxious measure. They do it in our Legislatures. It has been done in the Legislature of my State and, I suppose, in the Legislature of almost every other State. They have done it from time immemorial, and I suppose they will continue to do it.

I think we had better leave it just as we find it. I know of no way unless we attempt to punish a member for absenting himself or not voting when present. Suppose we bring an absent member into the House, as we have a right to do. But when he is brought in and he refuses to vote, what then. The gentleman from Illinois has just now stated that they could be counted to make a quorum. But what of that? A quorum—a majority of the House—must not only be present, but must join in the business of the House either for or against a measure, to make the action valid. If they are in, and do not vote upon the passage of the bill or measure in the House, they do not make a quorum in the transaction of business. You cannot pass the bill or measure unless a quorum votes! You cannot count those voting for the bill, and say of all others, constructively, that they voted against it, and thus pronounce the measure carried! Your Journals must show the votes—the yeas and nays of a quorum for and against the measure. But under this amendment there could be no such record. You could count the votes of those present and not answering to their names only by construction. This could not rightfully be done. You must have the votes before you can rightfully count them.

I state to the House, after mature reflection and after studying this question carefully for many years, that in my opinion you cannot improve upon the language adopted by the founders of the Republic as set forth in the rule reported by the committee. They made the rule as it now stands. You cannot secure votes by compulsion, and you cannot create them by construction.

The rule says any member shall vote except he be interested or excused. If any member or number of members refuse to vote you cannot provide a rule that will meet the difficulty.

A member not voting in his seat or going out, so long as he is not disorderly, so long as he commits no improper act, is responsible only to his constituents. If they send a member here who will not vote when in his seat, or will leave the House on roll-call, it is a matter that concerns him and them, and not this House. I say in conclusion I think we better let the rule stand as it is.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of my colleague from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] in the shape of a proviso.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that two things must occur in order to reach legislation in this House. The first of these two things is the presence of a quorum to do business. That is provided in the amendment of my friend from Virginia; and when it is ascertained that a quorum of this House is present for business, then, I think, another step is necessary in order to reach legislation, that a majority of that present quorum should concur in legislation.

The machinery in the amendment of by friend [Mr. TUCKER] provides for the first, that there shall be present in this House a quorum for the transaction of business, but it strikes me that under the amendment proposed by him there might be a quorum present ready to proceed to business, and yet, if a portion of that quorum present did not choose to vote, a minority of the quorum present might enact legislation, which I think would be objectionable. For instance, if there were two hundred and ten members present, one hundred voting in the majority, and forty in the minority, and seventy present but not voting, then, under the amendment offered by my friend, the one hundred would enact a law when it was not a majority of the two hundred and ten present in the Hall. I do not think it is in the spirit of our institutions that a minority of those present in the Hall should at any time enact a law for the Government of the United States.

Take another statement. Suppose that there were two hundred and ten members in the Hall, and one hundred and ten voted with the majority, fifty in the minority, and fifty present and not voting. Then, of the two hundred and ten in the House, constituting the quorum and present for business, one hundred and ten voting in the majority is a full majority of all present in the House, so when you count those present and not voting with the minority, still the bill is enacted or passed by a majority of those present in the Hall. In order to meet what I conceive to be these objections, I propose the following as a proviso to the amendment:

Provided, That those voting in the majority shall constitute a majority of those actually present in the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I understood one of the gentlemen in favor of the pending motion to intimate, if not assert, that in the British House of Commons the speaker may declare upon view, and without count, or without any count but his own, that a quorum is present. I am sure I do not understand it so. My opinion is that he is obliged to have a formal count of the House if it is desired.

I send up to the Clerk's desk, to be read, a short paragraph from May on Parliament, which is of course a standard authority upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the House has been made, if notice be taken by a member that forty members are not present, the speaker immediately tells the House; and when it is before four o'clock business is suspended until the proper number come into their places; but if after four o'clock the speaker at once adjourns the House until the following day. When it appears on the report of a division after four o'clock that forty members are not present the House is adjourned immediately, but when the House is in committee and forty members are discovered to be wanting, either upon a division or upon notice being taken of the fact, the chairman reports the circumstance, when the speaker again tells the House, and, if forty members be not then present, adjourns the House forthwith. In the mean time, while the House is being counted, the doors continue open, and members can enter during the whole time occupied by the counting.

Mr. TUCKER. Will my friend from Connecticut allow me to ask him from what page of May the Clerk has read?

Mr. TUCKER. From what edition?

The CLERK. This is the "second edition, revised and enlarged," published in 1851.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand, Mr Chairman, what has just been read to mean that there is a regular count and that it is not a mere hasty glance of the speaker; that it is not left merely to his discretion to declare a quorum present. He has to make a formal count and state to the House its result. I am sure the House of Commons would not submit to a decision upon a mere glance of the speaker that there is a quorum present, so that a bill should pass by the action of less than forty members.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Connecticut permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would remind the gentleman that in the British Parliament they do not vote by yeas and nays on a call of the roll.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand that.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. And that makes a great difference as regards this question. The vote is taken by tellers or counters and a call of the roll is not required.

Mr. HAWLEY. They have the roll called when there is a call of the House; somewhat as we do; but in the case of ordinary divisions they go out, the ayes at one door and the nays at another, and they are counted as they come in again.

Now, the evil, if there be one, in the existing system, that of which gentlemen complain, is simply this, that we of the minority claim a right, by sitting silent, to prevent less than a majority of the members elected from passing a bill. The worst that can be done by a factious minority, if that be the term applied to it, is to fight until the actual majority of the members elected shall pass the bill. When they are present that friendly majority constitute a quorum of themselves; they do not require the assistance of the minority; they run the House themselves and pass their bills. In case of what you call factious resistance we drive them only to that.

The modern State constitutions are all tending in that direction. I have not looked at them with this in view, but I know from a casual inquiry of gentlemen near me that the new constitutions of California, Minnesota, and Pennsylvania require that a bill shall not be regarded as passed unless an actual majority of the members elected shall vote for it.

Mr. ROBESON. New Jersey also.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, we are causing no hardship whatever in taking the ground we do against this new rule, and I think we do no serious wrong to the country at any time when we sit in our seats and decline to vote. If the majority desires to have a bill passed in opposition to our wishes, then let the majority come here and pass it over our heads. At any rate, I decline to be answerable to anybody but my constituents, if I sit in my seat and decline to vote. I hold myself responsible to them and to the Constitution alone. I take my position with that horse which is brought to the water, but cannot be made to drink, and I am afraid if the proposed rule should be adopted, I should say that no Speaker and no House should compel me to answer yes or no on a roll-call.

I think it very decidedly wrong, in the first place, that a Speaker should be at liberty to recognize or declare a quorum without a formal count, and, in the next place, that by any sort of combination of rules there should be a law put on the statute-book and declared in force which can show perhaps only a quarter or 10 per cent. of the members in favor of it.

Mr. PHISTER rose.

Mr. TUCKER. I desire to say just one word, if it will not come out of the time of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PHISTER.]

The CHAIRMAN. It would come out of that gentleman's time.

Mr. PHISTER. I have not had the opportunity to examine and critically analyze the language of the amendment offered by the honorable gentleman from Virginia; but if I understand its purpose, it is to recognize and enforce that provision of the Constitution which is found in section 5, article 1, as follows:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business—but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members.

Now, is it not an absurdity to speak of compelling the attendance of a member as though absent, when he is actually present? How can you assert or presume that a member is absent, when he is in attendance and known to be so? If he is in attendance, he is in attendance for the purpose of constituting a quorum having the capacity to do business. The question is, therefore, what shall be the evidence of the member's being in attendance? It is alleged that there can be only one evidence of that; and that is that he shall respond to his name in a vote by yeas and nays upon the pending proposition. The practice under the old rules has been to recognize that a member is present participating in the proceedings of the House for the purpose of objection, for the purpose of frustrating business, and yet he is not present to help to constitute a quorum to do business. Now, is not that an absurdity? Is it not a contradiction in terms and in fact?

Cannot his presence be ascertained by a call of the House, as is proposed by the amendment of the honorable member from Virginia? Can it not be ascertained by the sight, by the Speaker being constituted a committee for that purpose, or by other committee on quorum being appointed by the House to ascertain whether a quorum is present or not? It is purely a question of evidence. Even if it was to be determined alone by the sight of the Speaker as sole committee, or by the sight of any other committee on quorum to be appointed under the rule, is not the sight a more reliable sense than that of hearing?

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. PHISTER. I prefer not; this is my first appearance this session on the floor, and I have but little time. I say is not the sight a more reliable sense than the sense of hearing? The Clerk calls the roll of members with a view of ascertaining their votes by yea and nay. One member may vote in the stead of another; an outsider may vote for a member; the response of a member may be misunderstood. Mistakes may be made in a variety of ways under the present rule or practice. Therefore, we are far more liable to have a misunderstanding of the vote of a member, or in ascertaining when a member is present if we rely upon the hearing than if we rely upon sight. If we see a man we know he is here. If a committee should see him, if the Speaker as a committee of one should see him, then we would know that he is present.

The object of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is to prevent, respectfully speaking, the absurdity of saying that a man is not in attendance when he is in attendance; and, if possible, the still greater absurdity of enforcing the attendance of an alleged or supposed absent member when he is present and making him absent so far as the progress of business is concerned when he is present participating in the proceedings by objecting to the business.

Therefore, while I do not commit myself to the phraseology of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, (for if there is any doubt about its construction I hope it will be made accurate,) I must say that I consider the purpose of the amendment a commendable one.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, if it was my purpose to reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. PHISTER,] it seems to me that it would be a suitable and proper reply to say to him that the constitutional idea of a quorum is not the presence of a majority of the members of the House, but a majority of the members present and participating in the business of the House. It is not the visible presence of members, but their judgments and their votes, that the Constitution calls for.

I prefer, however, in the short time which I have, to discuss this question upon a different basis. This privilege, which the minority of this House at the last session availed itself of, is a privilege which every minority has availed itself of since the foundation of this Government. By pure accident, in looking over an index of the RECORD this morning, I found the account of a resolution, which was drawn up by a distinguished member of this House from Massachusetts, (Mr. Butler,) to cause the arrest of a distinguished member from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] for not voting. I believe, however, nothing ever came of that resolution.

Now, what is the practical upshot of the present practice? It is that the members of the minority of this House upon great occasions demand that every bill which is passed shall receive the absolute vote of a majority of the members elected. They do this in the face and eyes of the country. If they demand upon any frivolous occasion that there shall be such an extraordinary vote as that, they do it subject to the censure of the people of this land. This practice has hitherto kept this House in proper condition upon this subject, so that there has been no improper impeding of the public business.

It is a valuable privilege for the country that the minority shall have the right by this extraordinary mode of proceeding to call the attention of the country to measures which a party in a moment of madness and of party feeling is endeavoring to enforce upon the citizens of this land. And it works equally well with regard to all parties, for all parties have their times when they need to be checked, so that they may receive the opinions of the people who are their constituents and who are interested in the results of their legislation.

I say that as a practical matter the results hitherto throughout all our history have justified the construction which those upon this side of the House have put upon this matter, and which has been put equally by members of the other side in times past. I must say that I am glad to see that this question is being discussed not by divisions of party, but that gentlemen are taking views upon it with reference to its whole bearing, past and future as well as present.

Mr. McLANE. This is the first time in the history of this House that gentlemen on either side have ever attempted to justify the proceeding which so constantly takes place here, when members of the one side or the other of the House undertake to defeat legislation by sitting in their seats and refusing to constitute a quorum by voting. It is precisely such a proceeding as I should have expected the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to have denounced as revolutionary, for it is absolutely a revolutionary proceeding.

Mr. GARFIELD. One that would evidently disturb "the peace of the United States?"

Mr. McLANE. It is the only way in which the "peace of the United States" could be disturbed. I for one, however, am not very keen to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] because frequent occasions do occur when I would much rather resort to a revolutionary proceeding than submit to the arbitrary and tyrannical conduct of a majority. [Applause on the republican side.] But although I am not keen to adopt the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, I cannot allow myself to pretend for a moment that it is a legal or proper proceeding to defeat legislation in that manner.

The gentleman from Kentucky has very well made the point that if a majority are present to do business, though they may not vote, the business can be done; and under this very clause of the Constitution which gives us the right to adopt rules we provide that a member may be excused from voting. Ten, twenty, fifty members may be excused from voting; and yet though they do not vote they count to make a quorum. I presume nobody will gainsay that.

Now, suppose fifty members, though not excused, refuse to vote. In the language of the gentleman from Georgia, though taken to the water they will not drink. But they are here nevertheless, just as perfectly as the fifty excused; and they count to make a quorum precisely as if they had voted, if we choose so to declare by rule.

The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is not only perfectly constitutional, but it is substantially what the existing rule provides in regard to members excused from voting, though it is extended to members who are not excused. The rule in the revision and in the existing code provides for excusing members; and the gentleman from Virginia proposes now to extend that provision to members who are not excused.

Mr. STEPHENS. Allow me to call the gentleman's attention to this fact: that the object of this amendment is to give a constructive vote to those who actually do not vote.

Mr. McLANE. I do not so understand it.

Mr. STEPHENS. If not, what would it do? It requires a majority of a quorum on the record—that is, on the Journal—to constitute a vote of the House. If the object of this proposition is not to establish a system of constructive voting as to those who are absent or not voting, what do you gain?

Mr. McLANE. The amendment not only does not provide for constructive voting, but it states distinctly that the member refusing to vote shall remain recorded not voting precisely as if he had been excused from voting, but that his presence shall be noted and he shall be counted to make a quorum. The analogy I present is that if the House had excused him he would still not have voted, but would have been counted to make a quorum.

Mr. STEPHENS. But when you take the yeas and nays upon the passage of a bill, it is never passed unless a majority of the House, a quorum, vote upon its passage. If there be not a majority of those thus voting, after leaving out the excused, the meaure cannot be carried. If this amendment means anything practical, it must be to provide for a constructive vote.

Mr. McLANE. Less than a majority can pass a bill, if those present make with those excused from voting a majority of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS. Most assuredly not, I think. It requires a majority of those joining in the business to transact the business of the House. Those excused do not join in the transaction of the business from which they have been excused.

Mr. MILLS obtained the floor.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole having had under consideration the revision of the rules had come to no resolution thereon.

DEATH OF HON. ZACHARIAH CHANDLER.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, communicated the resolutions of that body upon the announcement of the death of Hon. ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Michigan; which were read, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 28, 1880.

Resolved, That the Senate received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Michigan, and for nearly nineteen years a member of this body.

Resolved, That, to express some estimate held of his eminent services in a long public career, rendered conspicuous by fearless, patriotic devotion, the business of the Senate be now suspended, that the associates of the departed Senator may pay fitting tribute to his public and private virtues.

Resolved, That the loss of the country, sustained in the death of Mr. CHANDLER, was manifest by expressions of public sorrow through the land.

Resolved, That, as a mark of respect for the memory of the dead Senator, the members of the Senate will wear crape upon the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, late a United States Senator from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That business be now suspended to allow fitting tributes to be paid to his public and private virtues; and that, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House at the close of such remarks shall adjourn.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. Speaker, for over twenty years the name of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER has been a household word in the State of Michigan. His business, social, private, public, and political life belongs solely to and is a part of the history of that State. He was born December 10, 1813 in New Hampshire, in sight of the granite hills of New England and came to Michigan in 1833, before he became of age. Soon after his arrival in Michigan he engaged in mercantile business, and laid the foundation of his great fortune, showing the same careful, untiring energy, foresight and straightforward integrity and honesty that followed him through life. While thus engaged in active business, with quiet, persistent, and unflagging assiduity, he acquired that knowledge of men and books that became in his after life a surprise even to his best friends. Constantly employed by day in the busy marts of trade and commerce, clear-headed and keen, he attended to his constantly increasing business. Busy hours over, the book and the library gave him their richest treasures.

Blessed with a home and fireside where one of the best and noblest of women was ever ready to welcome him and brighten his life, whose domestic charm of manner was only surpassed by the winning grace always shown in receiving the welcome friends of her husband, his life in early manhood was passed without a thought, as I believe, of a public career.

My own first and earliest recollections of him were, when as a boy, I was placed in his class in the Sabbath school of the First Presbyterian church of the city of Detroit. He was then one of the active young men of that church, earnestly engaged in all church-work.

He took no active part in political life until 1851, when he was elected mayor of Detroit. In 1857 he was elected Senator in place of General Lewis Cass, re-elected in 1863, and again in 1869. He was Senator continuously from 1857 to 1875, eighteen years. He was appointed Secretary of the Interior in October, 1875, and again elected to the Senate in 1879. During his senatorial terms occurred some of the most memorable events in the history of this nation.

Looking back now, it is easy to see how, step by step, the United States was gradually drawing nearer and nearer to the most tremendous struggle of ancient or modern times, to that crime of crimes, a civil war. In all the events that go to make up the history of those years, Mr. CHANDLER was one of the living, energetic actors.

The gradual extension of slave territory in the United States was arousing the attention, the crimes perpetrated under the code of slavery was raising to the pitch of horror the religious and moral sentiment, not only of the people of the United States, but of the world. The Kansas civil war was swelling and raising its portentous head on the western frontier. Old John Brown and his hardy sharpshooters in Kansas were educating themselves and the nation to a hatred of slavery and the extension of slave territory. Free speech, free territory, and free men was being raised as the war-cry of a great political uprising. After events showed that Mr. CHANDLER had given these matters close attention.

There was filibustering in Cuba and in Nicaragua by the South in hopes of making slave States to offset the rapid growth of the free States of the Northwest. Threats of resistance and secession were openly made by the South. The crack of the slave-whip was heard even in Congress over the heads of independent men from the North. The doctrine that any citizen with his slaves had a right to enter upon any territory of the United States and retain his slaves, called squatter sovereignty, was convulsing the land. The atrocious Lecompton act was passed. The fugitive-slave law, with all its attendant horrors, was being enforced, and Northern States passed acts to protect the liberty of their colored citizens.

Like a flash of lightning from a clear sky came the attack of John Brown and his army of ten or fifteen men on Harper's Ferry, in Virginia; and the whole South was thrown into a paroxysm of terror through fear of a servile war.

Upon all these subjects Mr. CHANDLER had given his views to the nation in the Senate.

The democratic convention at Charleston followed in May, 1860. The war of factions—the South against the North—was the fatal wedge that then and there disrupted the old democratic party. Substantially the opening gun of the rebellion was fired by that convention, and its echoes have never ceased to reverberate to this day in the democratic party. From that fatal day in Charleston events rapidly hastened to war, actual war. Abraham Lincoln was elected President, and traitorous hands were busy, traitorous hearts were plotting, to betray, break down, and destroy this Government.

A Secretary of the Treasury utterly uprooted the credit of the Government and substantially made it a bankrupt. A Secretary of War sold its cannon and guns or shipped them to southern arsenals, and sent its effective Army to out-of-the-way places on the distant frontier. A Secretary of the Navy sold our ships and naval stores and ammunition, sent loyal officers to sea in rotten unseaworthy hulks, and scattered the serviceable ships and vessels to our most distant stations. An Attorney-General advised the President that he could not use force against a State. A Chief-Justice refused to issue warrants to arrest traitors. Every Department was demoralized or in traitorous hands.

Lincoln was inaugurated, and then came the first gun of actual war at Sumter.

Through all these stormy scenes CHANDLER was ever and always watchful, ready, alert, brave, and outspoken.

In the debates and stormy scenes of the Senate he took his full share both of responsibility and debate. Long before his "blood-letting letter" he had warned the southern Senators that their actions meant, for them, revolution or a halter. He denounced the Lecompton act, the fugitive-slave bill, and the prosecutions under it. His painting of the Kansas horrors, burnings, whippings, and tortures of men and women who dared advocate free speech and free Territories for freemen will stand with the tremendous philippics of the old Greek and Roman orators and statesmen. But time will fail me to enumerate all his labors.

During the civil war and the years of reconstruction following his great business experience, his grand executive ability, his almost prophetic foresight, his extraordinary sagacity and wisdom in the conduct of affairs brought him to the front.

His judgment in regard to one of the noted generals in command of the Army of the Potomac showed his wonderful sagacity and decision of character, and the strong reliance he had upon the great under-currents of popular opinion and wisdom to justify his action. He denounced this general, and in the most positive manner charged him with failure as a military commander and as utterly incompetent to conduct successfully a great campaign. This charge, made and substantially proved in the Senate and before the country, resulted in a change of commanders of the Union Army, and, as a further result, final victory. It was sought subsequently to reverse this decision by an appeal to the people of the country in a presidential campaign, but the result showed that CHANDLER was right, and his action as proper and patriotic, was triumphantly vindicated by the nation, and the removed general became the defeated presidential candidate.

With the close of the war came another class of legislation, and here, as everywhere else, CHANDLER'S clear-headed business experience and ready facility of grasping details and grouping principles and reaching successfully the end came into play. There were reconstruction acts and financial acts of stupendous magnitude to be considered, revenues in unheard-of amounts to be collected, taxation to be adjusted, and amounts to be raised that staggered the most sanguine; a nation of freedmen to be raised to the standard of citizens, a race of slaves to be educated to understand the rights and duties and obligations of freemen; banking and loan acts, legal-tender and currency acts; treaties to be renewed; new relations with foreign nations to be entered into, old relations to be strengthened; international and constitutional questions, new and old, arising out of a war unheard of in its magnitude and astounding as to its results, to be settled; wounded soldiers to be cared for; an army to be disbanded; the Southern States to be rehabilitated; amendments of the Constitution to be adjusted to the changed condition of the people; in a word, the autonomy of the nation was to be re-established. All these and a thousand other subjects had to be and were considered by him apparently with equal ease, and the proceedings of the Senate will show his participation from day to day in them all.

The great men whose names are linked with the history of the civil war and the rehabilitation of the nation are fast passing away. Lincoln, Seward, Chase, Stanton, Greeley, Wilson, Sumner, Morton, and now ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, have vanished from the scenes, and in the records of history and the memories of those still remaining must rest their glorious fame.

From Senator CHANDLER'S first entrance into public life he was always the vigorous, rapid, sledge-hammer dealer of telling blows—no fears or quaking as to results. When the blow was delivered it was straight from the shoulder, vigorous and effective, delivered because he believed it necessary and without thinking of the tremendous effect of the stroke.

To the looker-on often the effect was not immediately apparent; it did not seem much of a blow; but the next day, the next week, the next month the effect would be manifest. Men would be talking of his power; and a little speech of ten minutes would be printed in every newspaper, talked of on every corner, read at every fireside, in the city, in the country, on the mountain, in the valley, on the plain, in the palace, down among the miners, up among the woodmen, in the drawing-room of the swift-rolling express train, in the forecastle of the fast-speeding ocean steamer, in the pulpit, in the pew, on the rostrum, on the stage, rousing the laggard, encouraging the timid, emboldening the brave, nerving the patriotic, striking terror to the traitor.

One element of his power was in his use of clear Anglo-Saxon words, meaning exactly what he said and saying exactly what he meant, and doing it so clearly that each hearer knew he was but crystallizing into thought and expression the exact floating idea in his own mind in the words that ought to be used.

He had a masterly way of using plain words for plain people, with plain meaning. He used no tricks of rhetoric, no flowers of speech, no studied expression, no graceful gesture. They would have been utterly out of place with him. But his facts would be true and telling—his speech rough-hewed but strong, his gestures ungainly but powerful. He was listened to by his friends because of their love; listened to by his enemies because his power compelled their attention. Warm, positive, and magnetic to his friends, he was stern, unyielding, aggressive in the presence of his enemies; always, however, battling for the right as he believed it. Firm and steadfast in his convictions, with him the contest must go on until he was victorious.

As he was always ready to give blows, so he could receive them.

The story is told of him, that amid the exciting scenes preceding the withdrawal of senatorial traitors in 1861, when some of them, goaded to madness by his merciless accusations of traitors, turned, and with fiery southern eloquence hurled stinging epithets and bloody threats and words of frenzied fury at him, he sat with a smile of scorn and derision, looking them steadily in the face, as though he heard them not but pitied their agonized emotions. Afterward, on being asked why he did not reply, he said, "Let me tell you a story." Holding his hands in front of him with his two thumbs together, he said, "Do you see, one of my thumbs is shorter than the other, twisted and broken. Well, once driving a yoke of oxen in my younger days, I got very mad at one of them, and raved and tore around considerably, and finally as the ox did not seem to care much about it, in my rage I struck him as hard as possible with my fist, thinking to break a rib at least. The sturdy old ox shifted his cud from one side to the other, looked around at me very quietly, whisked his tail gently, as though a fly was tickling him—while I was just howling with a broken thumb. So," the Senator concluded, "it often happens, that the man who supposes he is giving some one else a stunning blow finds he has only broken his own thumb."

When Mr. CHANDLER first appeared in the national political arena in 1856 he announced himself as a candidate for Senator. General Cass, whose term was about to expire, looked at the audacious young man with undisguised disdain, and was not slow to express his contempt for the "young man who," he said, "might know how to measure calico and tape, sell needles and thread, but was not fit to take his place in the council of the nation," and added, "we will remit him to his counter." One can imagine the expression of countenance with which, in language more strong than polite, young CHANDLER replied, "General Cass will find that he spelled his own name without a C when he made that remark." From that moment there was, on the part of the coming Senator, constant, steady, hard work to one end, and when the Legislature assembled Mr. CHANDLER was elected and General Cass relegated to private life.

In character and in person Mr. CHANDLER was like a granite block struck from the rugged mountains of his native State; rough-hewn, with jagged corners here and there, but solid, strong. His power of resistance to wrong or injustice, whenever or whence it might come, his capability of sustaining any load, his power to carry and readiness to assume any responsibility made necessary by his position was that of the granite rock always. His public life contains no instance of failure. Friends and patriots could unhesitatingly rely upon his help, assistance, and counsels to sustain the nation and its defenders. Enemies and traitors to his last day could rest assured that he was watchful and ready to interfere between them and injury or insult to the nation or the soldiers of the Union. To him traitors were a concrete, ever-present reality, not an abstract, far-away entity. The definition of treason in the Constitution of his country had a personal pointed application to individuals. Its clear-cut definition, "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," his mind instantly applied personally, and a citizen of the United States who made war against his own country was a traitor, not an "erring brother," or one who had only been engaged in "some unpleasantness." An unrepentant rebel was a traitor ever and always.

Yet no one was more ready than he to receive heartily any one desirous of returning to his allegiance to his flag and his country.

The great leader of the rebellion, who, with the oath of allegiance almost warm upon his lips, went out from the Senate of the United States, where he had given his pledge of loyalty to the Government, ay, his own Government, freely and voluntarily, with hand upraised to heaven, and calling God to witness his truth, to levy war against the United States, which act the Constitution had declared treason, was to him a traitor, whose name should never be enrolled on the roll of honor—the pension-roll of the patriotic, loyal, maimed, and wounded soldiers of the Union Army. CHANDLER'S last speech in the Senate went to the hearts of his countrymen, and will live with those of the distinguished orators and patriots of the early days of the Republic.

That there was one man at least in the Senate of the United States who dared to lift an indignant voice for patriots and patriotism, and against traitors and treason, gladdened the hearts and strengthened the hands of millions of citizens. The distinction between right and wrong, between loyal citizens and rebels, between patriots and traitors, seemed to be fast dying out, till a few burning words, in a midnight session, forced out of his inmost heart by insulting wrong, went like a zig-zag stroke of lightning through the wordy sophisms, and revealed to an indignant people the insult that was being attempted to land, country, flag, and all the patriotic impulses of the nation.

It is said that the eagle, when the storm arises, the lightnings flash, and thunders roll, and heavy winds and black portentous clouds are rushing through the heavens, spreads his broad wings and soars above the storm. Thus it was with our dead friend. When peril threatened the country, when disaster spread ruin and desolation, when men's hearts failed from fear, CHANDLER rose above the storm, scanned the ruin, the disaster, the peril and dismay, grasped the situation, mastered it in all its details, and calmly and quietly led the way to safety.

He was a born commander and leader of men—a power that would and could and did overcome all obstacles. In the calm or in the storm, in the whirlwind or in the tempest, always and ever self-poised, cool, daring, positive, ready for action. He was not the light-house to show others the way; he was the daring navigator who, when the light went out and rocks on either hand, could seize the helm and convey the ship safely into port.

Rarely has this country been so thoroughly shocked as it was on the morning of November 1, 1879, when the lightning flashed through the land—

Senator CHANDLER was found dead in his bed this morning.

The air had been full of his utterances; the papers loaded with the closing speeches of this honest-hearted, earnest-minded old man in the campaign then ending. His last speech but one was made, and the flash, "he is dead," came with the stunning effect of a blow.

Never so well known, never so earnest, never so admired and loved and appreciated by his friends; never so powerful against, hated, and feared by his enemies; but with harness on, his steady, manly voice ringing in the ears of his countrymen, he went down as the warrior in the shock of battle; ay, and at the very moment of anticipated victory, although the shout of actual victory he was never again to hear in this world.

Farewell to thee! illustrious statesman, with a lion's heart!
Farewell to thee! uncompromising patriot, with a true soul!
Farewell to thee! indefatigable worker, with an iron frame!
Farewell to thee! undaunted friend, with a faithful breast!
Farewell to thee! loyal citizen, with patriotic impulses!
Farewell to thee! stalwart politician, intrepid counselor,
Fearless adviser, genial companion!
We mourn for thee! A Senator without reproach;
A man without stain;
A soul above suspicion.

"The air is thick with death. His flying shafts
Strike down to-day the bravest in the land;
And here and there, how suddenly he wafts
His fatal arrows! Nor can long withstand
The mailed warrior, or the statesman manned, Against him. But why should he hasten on
* * * * to strike one down
Just in the zenith of his strength and glory of renown?

"CHANDLER! above thy grave we bow in tears!
The generous friend, the unrelenting foe,
In halls of state who stood for many years,
Like fabled knight, thy visage all aglow,
Receiving, giving sternly, blow for blow!
* * * * * * *
"Champion of right! But from eternity's far shore
Thy spirit will return to join the strife no more.
Rest, statesman, rest! Thy troubled life is o'er."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the largest tree in the forest sometimes breaks the stillness of the day by the suddenness of its fall: so ZACHARIAH CHANDLER startled a continent when he went down to death! Thirty-six hours before he died he was the guest of my own city. He spoke there, both in the afternoon and evening, each time to a large concourse of people. He retired at twelve o'clock, and rested well through the night.

Many of our citizens bade him good-bye at the early train for Chicago; and little did they think as the cars rolled out into the light of that beautiful morning that it was the last he was ever to behold on earth! Yet so it was, for within twenty-one hours thereafter he was dead.

I think only those who saw him during these last hours of his life could realize the suddenness of his death. Though the grim messenger walked beside him, no shadow fell upon his pathway. His thoughts were all of life; he could scarcely have been thinking of the possibilities of death; his every act and energy was devoted to the work before him; he talked of nothing else, and apparently he thought of nothing else.

He was the avant courier of republicanism. His voice had rung out from Maine to Wisconsin. He had moved the people by the potency of his presence and the earnestness of his appeals. He believed that national destiny itself trembled in the balance, and he imparted this belief to the masses wherever he went, for they knew that his heart was in his work and his convictions were in his words.

Amid scenes like these it could hardly have been possible that he had a thought of what was to come. He could scarcely have dreamed that while yet the plaudits of thousands were ringing in his ears he was to meet, in the heart of that great city, in the dead hour of the night, in the silent loneliness of his room, that dread messenger, who gave no warning and accepted no delay; yet so it was, for he awoke only from the sleep of life to sink back again in the sleep of death.

No, Mr. Speaker, none but those who remember the earnest manner and pathetic voice with which he besought the chairman of each successive meeting to telegraph him at Detroit on the night of the election the result of the contest can realize the overmastering interest which had taken possession of him. The news he so longed to hear did indeed flash along the wires, but whether it died out in the darkness of that shoreless sea, or whether it penetrated the mystic regions of the great beyond, no word ever comes back to tell us.

We who speak of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER here to-day must speak of him as he was, for he never feared to speak for himself. And his words will be cherished and remembered when ours are lost and forgotten. No flowers of rhetoric, no high-wrought historic parallels, no half-drawn apologies for what he was or what he did, will do for him.

He was a plain, blunt man. He was combative, he was aggressive, and in what he believed to be right he was relentless. He was a man of the people, he was a friend of the poor, he loved liberty, he hated oppression, he abhorred treason, and he detested hypocrisy. He was a partisan, he was a patriot, he was a hero!

Like the oak he resembled, he was reared in storms and rocked in tempests. Strong and massive in body, he was stronger in will; firm in principles, he was formidable in argument; quick to see the salient points of a question, he brought his broad common sense to bear upon it, and not infrequently by a single sally he broke through and demolished a whole battle-line of sophistry. Who can ever forget the expression of that face, or the instantaneous effect produced upon thousands, when from the rostrum he put that one question:

If this is not a government, what did the rebels surrender to at Appomattox? I tell you, my friends, they surrendered to the Government of the United States of America!

Or when, on that memorable night, in the Senate of the United States he made that terrific onslaught which startled both sides of the Chamber and roused the whole country, what member even of the opposition who did not feel the force of what he said? In the language of Mr. Webster, it was one of those outbursts of passion and power which, if they come at all, come "like the outbreaking of a fountain from the earth, or the bursting forth of volcanic fires, with spontaneous, original, native force!"

This was the secret of Mr. CHANDLER'S power. His methods were clear and practical, his reasoning synthetic, and his attacks spontaneous and irresistible. While others were examining the bricks and mortar in the structure, and carefully calculating the resistance to be overcome, he selected his point of attack, and with crowbar and sledge breached the walls and carried the citadel by storm.

Savants and philosophers may style these methods crude and Western, but while the names of Douglas, Morton, and CHANDLER live the people will believe them to possess an innate force which all the learning of the schools cannot give.

The opinion is often expressed that certain very good and competent men are holding back a political millennium by their persistent refusal to accept office and enter upon public life. Somebody has ungraciously said of such, that they were made up of two parts of selfishness and two of timidity. I know not how the fact may be, but if it be true, ZACHARIAH CHANDLER did not belong to this class. He never took counsel either of his selfishness or his fears. He was not possessed of that happy temperament which enabled him to stand quietly by while aggressive wrong was crushing out defenseless right.

By the very nature of his make-up, he was forced to enter the arena. And thus he met all the malignity, denunciation, and abuse which ever come to the earnest, the faithful, and the true. Yet nothing could dissuade him. The critical might carp, the mediocre patronize, and the malign scoff and deride, but all the pigmies of earth and sky could not stay the dauntless old hero in the work he had marked out for himself. To such a man the holding of civil office was the merest incident in the world; for whether in public or private life he was the natural defender of the people.

That Mr. CHANDLER was intense and bitter, that he sometimes wrongly suspicioned the motives and acts of others, is only to say that he belonged to the class of positive men; but that under it all there was a broad and generous sincerity and a heart as tender as a child's none who knew him need to be told. He was, indeed, in earnest; but if any supposed his earnestness took on only the cold malignity of hate, they studied his character to but little purpose. I could only claim to know him as we all knew him here, yet I do not care to be told that he was moved by other than the loftiest and purest motives.

Only the night but one before he died, in my own house, in common with others, I saw that firm lip quiver and those stern eyes moisten as he recounted the measureless wrongs which had been visited upon the poor freedmen of the South; and I believe mortal man was never actuated by higher or holier motives than he when he swore by the God that made him that he would never bate one jot nor tittle of effort until these monstrous wrongs should be righted.

I allude to these things here in no partisan spirit, for that should be banished from these halls to-day; but I speak of them only to be just to him in his grave, as he was just and fearless before all the world. And I feel sure that could he have left any injunction behind, it would have been: "If you speak of me at all, in the language of sacred song, speak of me—

Just as I am."

Burke I think it was who said that true sentiment was the logic of common sense. Such, I think, was the sentiment of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER. It was plain, practical, and direct.

No more touching provisions can be found in the wills of public men than in those of Thaddeus Stevens and Mr. CHANDLER. While the former made no provision for the care of his own grave, he set aside a sum of money and directed that the "sexton keep his mother's grave in good order, and plant roses and other cheerful flowers at its four corners every spring."

So Mr. CHANDLER, with just words enough to express his meaning, said, in effect, to his wife and daughter, "You are my only heirs; as you have loved and trusted me, so I love and confide in you. I lay my fortune at your feet, and that you may be unfettered in its enjoyment and use, I relieve it from any word coming back from the grave."

Could affection be more tender? Could confidence be more complete? Where shall the well-springs of the human heart be better studied than in the wills of these two remarkable men?

Impartial history will assign Mr. CHANDLER his proper place in the ranks of America's public men. We cannot do that here to-day. It may, however, be safely said that if Seward, Chase, and Sumner might draft the plans for the fabric of freedom, Wade, Stevens, and CHANDLER might lay its foundations and lift its walls to completion. Noble trio! How fiercely they wrought; how well they triumphed.

The last of them now sleeps on the banks of the river he loved so fondly. And to-day Wisconsin comes with her foster-mother, Michigan, to lay a garland upon his grave. He loved to tell us that the boundaries of his own county of Wayne once embraced both our States. Representatives of Michigan, your loss is our loss; and over our common calamity a nation grieves to-day. We come to mingle our tears with yours, and to utter the fervent prayer that he who sleeps so near your metropolis may rest in peace so long as that city shall stand—yea, so long as the waters that roll by it flow outward to the sea.

Mr. HUBBELL. Mr. Speaker, it is said that "death loves a shining mark, a signal blow." Than in ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, whose death to-day we mourn in common with the whole patriotic people of the nation, the "fell sergeant" has had few more brilliant marks, has struck few nobler lives, and the Republic has had to mourn no more useful citizen, no more upright or purer patriot.

Mr. CHANDLER was a native of New England. He was born at Bedford, in the State of New Hampshire, December 10, 1813; in the State which gave birth to and molded the character of Daniel Webster; in the land of strong convictions, of sterling integrity, of uncompromising patriotism, and inflexible devotion to freedom. Here in his native State, building up a vigorous frame and robust health among its granite hills—here amid its noble associations and grand institutions of learning; amid a people rejoicing in their revolutionary history—in its perils and privations and its glories and triumphs—loving freedom and hating oppression, ZACHARIAH CHANDLER imbibed those rigid principles of justice, that invincible love of freedom and of country, that incorruptible integrity which he transplanted in his new home in the then "far West," and which distinguished every act of his public life, and in support of which he died literally in harness.

In his home in Michigan, the State of his adoption, these sterling qualities were combined with and regulated by an intelligence and sagacity so rarely at fault as to enable him to amass an ample fortune, place him at the head of the business men of the State, and soon point him out as a man of mark, as a man of rare and genuine merit, of great force of character, of intrepid courage and sterling worth, and won for him the respect, confidence, and enduring love of its people.

No man was ever trusted in public or private life as was ZACHARIAH CHANDLER by the people of Michigan, and no man ever ended a public career against whose integrity less could be said.

No position in their gift, however high or responsible, no honor, however great, was too high for his merits or too great for their love. Thus in 1851 he was mayor of Detroit; in 1852 the whig candidate for governor; in 1857, a Senator of the United States; in 1863, re-elected as Senator; in 1869, again re-elected; and again in 1879. In 1875 he was given by President Grant the portfolio of the Interior. In every trust he acquitted himself honorably, fearlessly, ably, and returned it impressed with the marks of his genius.

In nothing, indeed, was Mr. CHANDLER an ordinary man. As a husband and a father and a friend, ever faithful, trusting, and true, his great, manly heart delighted in exhibitions of the tenderest devotion. He never abandoned a friend, and was ever truest and most devoted to him in the hour of his misfortune or trials. He was not a place-seeker nor a time-server; but he was a lover of his country and a hater of its enemies, and always filled to the measure the place he occupied; and being a man of strong convictions and dauntless courage the enemies of his country always felt his presence, and were never spared his bitterest invectives.

Mr. Speaker, I knew Mr. CHANDLER intimately. He was to me a "friend, philosopher, and guide," and I should be unjust to his memory did I not speak of him as he was—a man who always acted his honest convictions without regard to or fear of the consequences.

As a Cabinet minister, with the portfolio of the most complicated and troublesome Department of the Government, noted for its intrigues and scandals, the Interior, with its important divisions and the intricate and delicate character of many of their important duties very difficult to comprehend and to intelligently manage, and rendered doubly so by outside combinations for the promotion of private advantage and fraud—in that responsible and difficult trust, his masterly executive ability, his great common sense, his disciplined business habits, his integrity, his wonderful industry, his intuitive knowledge of men and their motives, and his great courage and nerve rendered his administration such a marked success that his able and accomplished successor publicly admitted that his ambition was to leave the Department in as good shape as he received it. He never parleyed with men whom he believed to be dishonest. To illustrate his blunt and direct methods, pardon an anecdote: Soon after he took charge of the Interior Department, I met him here in Washington and the usual salutations had hardly passed between us when he said: "I have been reforming in the Interior Department to-day." And in reply to my query as to what he had done he replied: "I have emptied one large room and left it in charge of a colored porter, who has the key, who cannot read or write, and who is instructed to allow no one to enter it without my orders, and I am under the impression that the public interests are safe so far as that room and its business are concerned until I can find some honest men to put into it." A further conversation developed the fact that by plain business methods he had collected his proofs, and thus armed he could only deal a deadly blow. Thus early he mastered all the intricate and difficult details of the service; early he clearly comprehended its needs and vigorously and laboriously applied himself to their practical accomplishment. In short, he established order where chaos previously ruled, reorganized details, secured efficiency, and effected a due responsibility in all the branches of the service.

Honest himself, he tolerated no doubtful practices, no improper relations in the Department. Fraud vanished at his touch. Incompetency and imbecility met their reward, and he transmitted the portfolio to his successor with the Department purged of many injurious scandals, and the service, in all its details, greatly simplified and improved.

As a Senator, Rome, in the days of her highest virtue and greatest strength, had none nobler, purer, or more fearless. Entering the Senate during the stormy debates and violent struggles of the sections on the question of slavery, Mr. CHANDLER stepped at once to the front as a recognized and trusted leader on the side of freedom. The times were full of peril, and terribly tested all the metal in men's souls. But during that struggle, in debate, from 1857 until 1860, carried on on the one side by patriotic, liberty-loving men, who hated slavery and antagonized it because they dreaded its extension, and on the other by men who worshiped slavery, were bound to extend and perpetuate it or destroy the common government inherited from the fathers, who recognized the code, and under its bloody rules tried to intimidate the representatives of the people from the Northern States in the discharge of their duties, no man ever did or will say that ZACHARIAH CHANDLER ever faltered in the discharge of his duty as he saw it. He abhorred the code, condemned alike by the laws of man and of God, yet while in the discharge of his public trusts it had no terrors for him, and never caused him for a moment to falter in the full and complete performance of his duties.

It is not my purpose here to enter into that memorable debate upon the question of slavery and the rights of the States which preceded and culminated in the war of rebellion, more than to say that Mr. CHANDLER'S sagacity readily penetrated the designs of the southern leaders, readily saw that slavery was only a means to the consummation of their purpose—the disruption of the Union. Indignantly and vehemently he raised his voice in exposure of this traitorous plot. He was "no orator as Brutus" was. He apparently despised all mere ornaments of speech, but in his vigorous, terse English he left no doubt as to his meaning and purpose. And thus he fearlessly labored everywhere and on all occasions to arouse the country to a sense of the impending danger, and to prepare it for a conflict of arms in support of the Union. He had no faith in compromise, but felt that the inevitable and deadly conflict must come, and tried to prepare his countrymen for it. The events which rapidly followed demonstrated the wisdom as it did the justice of his conclusions and his course. The rebellion came upon us with its appalling sacrifices and sufferings, and awfully vindicated his sagacity and the justice of his charges against the southern leaders.

Great names and great men, so called, unless distinguished by worth and patriotic motives and corresponding actions, received from him no homage. His country to him was all in all. Every patriotic man he claimed as a friend, and to every patriot, to all patriots, of every grade or character, if their sincerity were demonstrated by works, he yielded his whole support, all his weight and influence.

But the man who laid himself down in the pathway of his country's honor and glory, the man who, whether from imbecility or design, obstructed or impeded his country's triumphant march to victory, to perfect and permanent peace, to that man ZACHARIAH CHANDLER was an inflexible foe, and to him he fearlessly proclaimed his hostility.

As a member of the Committee on the Conduct of the War he was active, terribly in earnest, and untiring in industry, and rendered to the nation the most important services. No name, however high, baffled his inquiries or escaped his judgment.

Notwithstanding he had regarded McClellan's appointment as wise and judicious, yet, for reasons already made a part of our country's history, he boldly arraigned him in the face of the country, in the teeth of his great popularity and the great power he wielded in command of the armies, as utterly incompetent for the weighty duties of his high position, and demanded his removal, as justified by the highest reasons of expediency and the loftiest motives of patriotism.

Believing that Pope, at second Bull Run, was sacrificed by Fitz-John Porter, and that our loss of life and disaster at that battle was caused by Porter's criminal insubordination, he boldly denounced him as a traitor to his country and demanded his trial and punishment.

Against all men whom he believed to be untrue to his country in her hour of peril, his great patriotic heart instinctively rebelled, and they were made the victims of his terrible denunciations.

The war of the rebellion ended, Mr. CHANDLER took a prominent part in that legislation which reconstructed the States in rebellion and gave them representation in the halls of Congress, and here as elsewhere his career was marked by the same distinguishing traits of character.

Coming into the Senate again in 1878, he immediately stepped to the front and the country knew that plain, honest old ZACH. CHANDLER, as they loved to call him, was again in his seat, and the democratic party, which he never loved, was made painfully aware of his presence. Stripping the guise of flimsy pretexts from off the reasons actuating the men who forced the extra session, he sounded the key-note of alarm—the bugle-call of the campaign of 1879, in which he labored day and night, closing his great work in one of the ablest and grandest speeches of his life in the Garden City of America, where, ere the dawn of day succeeded his great effort, he died. The life of a great, earnest, honest, and broad-souled man went silently out with the watches of the night, and in his death the Republic mourns an upright and useful citizen, a noble Senator, a peerless patriot, and humanity an abiding friend. Apparently in robust health, in the vigorous exercise of all his great faculties, peacefully and serenely, without a struggle and free from pain, his noble spirit sank into the "blind cave of eternal night," passed triumphantly from the active scenes and duties of worldly life to the judgment-seat of his God.

Thus yields the cedar to the ax's edge,
Whose arms gave shelter to the princely eagle,
Under whose shade the ramping lion slept;
Whose top-branch overpeer'd Jove's spreading tree,
And kept low shrubs from winter's powerful wind.

But though dead, he is not forgotten. In every patriot's home, in the home of every friend of humanity, of every friend of freedom and free institutions, his name will long be cherished with endearing pride; and history in recording his actions, in reviewing his services to his country and to mankind, and in its judgment of his character, will as surely rank him high among the good and great men of his times.

Peace to his ashes.

Mr. CRAPO. Mr. Speaker, the life of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER is a marked illustration of that character which is developed by our American institutions and which is distinctly American. In no other country and under no other system of society and laws do we look for the manifestation of such individual growth and power. Starting from the humble surroundings of a New England farm, with the limited advantages of a plain and simple country home, with the training of the unpretending fireside and village school, he emerges into self-reliant manhood. Then follow the struggles of life amid the activities and hardships of a western settlement; the competitions of business, bringing substantial rewards; the contests for higher position, while holding securely the advances made; the reaching out for wider influence and greater mastery over the thoughts and acts of men; and, finally, the control and power which made him a recognized leader and a mighty force in the land. With no external advantages to aid him, he overcame obstacles and conquered opposition and secured for himself commanding position and influence. He was conscious of his own inherent strength; he knew that he lived in a country full of opportunities to the earnest and faithful man; and he realized that in this free land men have equal right to place and wealth and power if they have will and strength to win them. He asked no odds and he accepted no gifts. What he was and what he possessed came as the result and reward of his own personal efforts. He did not drift into high positions, but earned them by sheer exertion and force of character. His history is the record of a successful man; and we can find few more impressive examples, even in this country which is so full of personal achievements.

In private life Mr. CHANDLER was bluff, hearty, and sincere. He was outspoken with the candor of positive truth. He did not conceal his admiration of one whom he liked, and he was equally open in the expression of disapprobation of one he disliked. He was frank and generous in his approval, and he was equally free and severe in his condemnation. There was an integrity in his friendship and an earnestness in his recognition of friends which endeared him to those who knew him intimately.

The personal qualities which marked his private intercourse were still more conspicuous in his public life. There was always the same positiveness of manner and speech. His large frame, his vigorous health, and commanding presence were not more remarkable than the robustness of his mind, his stout heart, his stalwart courage, and resistless energy.

His political opinions were formed during the controversies of the Missouri compromise and the attempt to establish slavery in Kansas. He entered public life just as the struggle for national supremacy was culminating into war. He regarded it as a question of liberty or slavery, of national unity or its dismemberment. He saw with clear vision the terrible magnitude of the issue, and this made him a partisan. It was impossible for him with his consciousness and convictions to be otherwise than a partisan. He was intensely in earnest. He feared southern aggression, and unceasingly fought it; he detested disloyalty, and was bold in his discoveries of it; he abhorred the rebellion with intolerant hatred, and labored for its destruction. He would grant no concession where he believed the principle was vital, and, however hot or bitter or uncertain the fight, he neither gave nor asked for quarter. During the dark days of war his heart never faltered and his voice never trembled. He exacted the utmost fidelity and diligence from those who supported the Union cause, and had little respect or charity for those who brought failure to its arms. His watchfulness and aggressiveness did not cease with the war. When conciliation seemed to have failed, and the old strife, which it was supposed had been buried on the battle-field, was revived in Congress, Mr. CHANDLER naturally came to the front, and with the same defiant courage of opinion which gave him master influence during the war, he proclaimed in the Senate, and before the people, the dangers which threatened the peace and good order of the nation, in language which could not be misunderstood.

Perhaps in a less turbulent period of our history Mr. CHANDLER would not have occupied so prominent a place. He was not a great statesman, but he was needed in an exigency, and most nobly did he meet the requirement. No man better understood the patriotic impulses of the people, and no man had greater power in expressing and arousing popular sentiment. He was in sympathy with the masses; he had an intense sense of justice between man and man; he estimated men according to their true worth; he never stood upon his dignity, nor by word or manner indicated any personal superiority. The coarse dress or rough manner did not repel him, but every man, however plain or humble, was at ease in his presence. He stood nearer to the people and had a stronger hold upon them than any other Senator.

The secret of his success and his control of the popular mind may be found in his sincerity, his intensity, his constancy, and his directness. There was no deceit in his nature. You were never left in doubt about his views; and, what is more, he was never in doubt himself. You always knew where to find him. He used vigorous Saxon. His utterances were plain and terse. His illustrations, although sometimes extravagant, were full of rugged meaning, and what they lacked in elegance was made up in force. Whatever he said he meant should be understood just as he said it.

There was nothing negative about him. His policy was never timid nor vacillating. However great the responsibility, he never hesitated to assume it, but he always went to the front. It was this positive, aggressive, uncompromising spirit which gave him leadership and enabled him to infuse courage into men of less boldness. He was impatient of opposition, and as ready to condemn his own party associates as his opponents when their policy was at variance with his own.

Mr. CHANDLER was not free from faults, and he never attempted their concealment. Every one knew what manner of man he was. He made no claim to greatness, nor to any special merit. The men who denounced him as a bitter partisan, and who threw stones of hate and ridicule against him, even now, before the period of passionate strife in which he was an actor has entirely passed away, have acknowledged his virtues.

His personal integrity, his resistless energy, his burning patriotism, his rugged frankness, and his fearless devotion to duty, made him conspicuous in the legislation of the country and in the councils of his party.

He died with the harness on, in the mid-day of his fame and usefulness, actively participating with all the fervor of his nature in the struggle which he believed of vital consequence to his countrymen.

We cannot but admire the character of a man who "was the architect of his own fortune," and who, under a beneficent and free government, which gives equal advantages to all, relying upon his own brave heart and strong arm and indomitable will, won a name and wielded a power which will continue far beyond the generation in which he lived.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, on the 1st day of November last the sad announcement was made that Senator CHANDLER was dead; that his lifeless remains were found in bed at the Pacific Hotel, in the city of Chicago. The report was doubted at first by the friends of the deceased Senator, but all doubt was soon removed, and the city and State of his adoption arrayed themselves in the habiliments of mourning. Senator CHANDLER was known to more of the people of Michigan than any other of her citizens. The name of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, or "Old Zach," as he was more commonly called, was familiar in every household, and was spoken with the utmost freedom by old and young alike, but to-day, to them, his voice is stilled in death. To-day his name is spoken with sadness and sorrow from the Atlantic to the Pacific, at least in every Northern State. Mr. CHANDLER'S life in many respects was an eventful one. Born in the town of Bedford, amid the rugged hills of a New Hampshire home, he soon began to exhibit those traits of character which in after life made him so prominent. In 1833, when but twenty years of age, he became satisfied that his native State was no field in which to develop his business powers, and he sought a home in the then undeveloped great Northwest, and found it in the city of Detroit. What a broad field was then opened to the view of the energetic young New Englander! Nearly all our country west of Buffalo at that time was but an uninhabited wilderness. Michigan was but a Territory, with a few thousand inhabitants, and contained within its territorial government what is now known as the State of Wisconsin. The city of Detroit was but a small town, its inhabitants being largely engaged in trade with the natives of the forest. But the city of Detroit to-day is one of the great cities of the Northwest, while Michigan has a population of a million and a half of people, and Wisconsin nearly an equal number, and both of these great States are teeming with all the enterprise and industry of the age. Such result was obtained during the years of Mr. CHANDLER'S residence in Michigan, and was largely due to his fostering care while in official life. Wonder not, then, that the city of Detroit and the State of Michigan mourn the loss of her honored dead, for he was always a watchful guardian of their interests. The plain result of his watchful care for his State and his desire to advance her prosperity while in public life is visible along all the great chain of lakes and rivers which encompass her borders. No one has done more to advance and build up the interests of the Northwest than the late Senator.

When Mr. CHANDLER arrived in Detroit, like thousands of other young men who then sought a home in the West, his greatest wealth was his robust constitution, and his chief capital to start with in the great battle of life was his habits of industry, his self-will, pluck, and integrity. Soon after his arrival he entered into a business partnership in the dry-goods trade with one Franklin Moore, a brother-in-law. This partnership continued but for a few years, when Mr. Moore retired from the firm, Mr. CHANDLER continuing in the business until he accumulated a fortune and became the most prosperous merchant in the State. Mr. CHANDLER'S political life commenced in 1851, when he was nominated by the whigs of Detroit and elected mayor of said city. His extensive business had made him acquaintances and friends all over the State, and in the fall of 1852 he was nominated as the whig candidate for governor, but, while running largely ahead of his ticket, he was defeated by Hon. Robert McClelland, his democratic opponent. He made his first political speeches in his canvass for the governorship, and soon became the recognized leader of the whigs of his State. He took an active part in the formation of the republican party at Jackson in 1854, and a leading part in the campaigns of 1854 and 1856, speaking in every part of the State, and his plain logic, clear and forcible language gained him friends wherever he went. When the republicans obtained control of the Legislature in 1856 the party and people with great unanimity demanded the election of Mr. CHANDLER to succeed General Lewis Cass in the Senate of the United States. He took his seat in the Senate on the 4th of March, 1857, and was twice re-elected, and served continuously for eighteen years. The venerable HANNIBAL HAMLIN is the only one of his first associates in the Senate who is serving in a like capacity to-day, and, I believe, the only one now in public life. Nearly all others sleep the last sleep. At the time Mr. CHANDLER entered the Senate excitement ran high over the repeal of the once famous Missouri compromise, and the great contest relating to slavery in the Territories was soon fought out between the friends of freedom and oppression.

In this conflict, Mr. CHANDLER stood boldly up for the fundamental rights of man, and was a fit representative of his great liberty-loving constituency. The continuous eighteen years of Mr. CHANDLER'S senatorial career were years fraught with momentous events, and were the most eventful years of American history. It was during these years that the bondmen were made free, that the nation was saved, the Union restored, and liberty preserved to the American people. It was during these years that the rights of man were more firmly guaranteed by amendments to the fundamental law of the land. It was during the later years of Mr. CHANDLER'S life that the financial credit and the integrity and honor of the nation were at stake; when demagogues sought to build up a political organization upon their country's shame. In the settlement of all these great questions, the vote and voice of the late Senator truly represented the patriotic sentiment of the people of his State. In October, 1875, Mr. CHANDLER was chosen by President Grant as one of his constitutional advisers, and placed at the head of the Interior Department, where he remained until March 4, 1877. His appointment, at first, did not meet with the commendation of the self-assumed, high-toned, theoretical politicians of his party; but when he passed over the Interior Department to his successor, the people and press of all parties vied with each other in commending the manner in which he had conducted the duties of his office. He demonstrated by practical experience that he was the best reformer of the civil service who chose his assistants and employés because of their practical knowledge of the duties they were selected to perform, rather than he who selected them because they succeeded in answering questions relating to matters which in no manner pertained to their official duties. As Secretary of the Interior he purified that Department of the Government, and showed an executive talent surpassed by no one who had filled the position.

Upon the resignation of Senator Christiancy in the spring of 1879, Mr. CHANDLER, as is well known, was chosen by the Legislature of Michigan to fill the vacancy caused by such resignation. In his long official life his great executive and business ability, his industry and strict integrity, have met the highest commendation of the press and people of all parties. No one has ever been bold enough to charge ZACHARIAH CHANDLER with corruption or peculation in office. Senator CHANDLER was in many respects truly a great man. He was not great in his style of oratory; he was not great in his classical learning or in his knowledge of the sciences, but he was great, powerfully great, in his knowledge of men. He was one who could mold public opinion and assimilate the judgments of men, and such a man is truly great. He was a leader of men; he drew about him in his political councils not only the aged, but the young, the vigorous, and active; he was a man of the people and from the people, and herein lay his strength. In his notions he was practical. His language was plain, and his ideas were clear and always forcibly expressed. There never could be any misapprehension as to which side of a business or political question he was on. Mr. CHANDLER was a partisan, but he was was first of all a patriot. While he held his country above party, yet he firmly believed that the stability of the nation and the political equality and welfare of all our people depended upon the success of the party he so faithfully labored for and loved so well. He was bold, fearless, and aggressive in his language and demeanor; he was uncompromising in his utterances, and never shrank from characterizing offenses in their true light. Had he been less fearless he might at times have excused his language by uttering words spoken by another:

> Judge me not ungentle,
> Of manners rude, and violent of speech,
> If when the public safety is in question
> My zeal flows warm and eager from my tongue.

But he made no apologies. He preferred to leave his countrymen to judge his words and motives from his patriotic acts. Mr. CHANDLER was a positive man. He threw the whole power of his intellect against that which he believed to be wrong, and he never wavered in his struggle to promote right and advance truth and justice. He was possessed of great energy and great mental and physical powers, and he never doubted his ability to accomplish that which he set out to perform. He adopted the motto of another: "Attempt the end and never stand to doubt." If we look back over the pages of the world's history we will find that the men of the mold of Mr. CHANDLER, men that were positive, aggressive, bold and fearless in the right, were the men who came to the front in advancing the great principles of political and religious liberty. Mr. CHANDLER above all was an honest man, in official as well as private life. He was plain in his dress and simple in his habits. He was generous with his means and the friend of the needy and unfortunate, and thousands of such in his adopted city dropped a tear over his bier as they viewed his manly form in death. He was a firm believer in the integrity of the American people, and during the political campaign of 1878 he took the strongest ground in favor of maintaining our national credit. He asserted that after mature reflection the American people would no more think of repudiating the nation's obligations than they would think of submitting to a dissolution of the Union itself, and he gave this fact as an illustration of the integrity of our people. He said, during the late war, while he was in Washington that he loaned to our soldiers several thousands of dollars, in small sums of from two to ten dollars to each, but that the whole amount was repaid to him with the exception of about $10, and he was satisfied the poor men who owed him that small amount had given their lives for their country.

Mr. Speaker, during the three short years that I have had the honor of a seat in this body, very many of our desks have been draped in mourning. Our legislative associates have fallen all around us. Not only the small in stature and the physically weak, but those who seemed to stand like mighty oaks in the forest have been stricken down by the icy hand of death. Surely "God moves in a mysterious way."

When we separated and went to our homes last summer no one seemed more likely to return in the vigor of health and strength than he for whom we mourn to-day; but as a great political contest in which he had taken an active part was about to close, he slept. His popularity was never so great as on the day of his death. He had become a recognized leader of his party, and his words gave strength and wisdom to an aggressive host. It will be hard to fill his place in the councils of the nation or in the leadership of his party.

Mr. Speaker, I first became acquainted with Mr. CHANDLER in 1856, and he was then known by the familiar name of "Old Zach," yet he was under forty-three years of age. For the last twelve years of his life I knew him intimately, personally and politically, and our relations were very friendly.

Sir, I feel that the nation has lost a patriotic statesman, his State its most illustrious citizen, and he who speaks to you a noble friend. But ZACHARIAH CHANDLER is gone. In the beautiful "Elmwood," on the banks of a mighty river, his friends laid him to rest, where his ashes will mingle with the dust of other illustrious dead.

In common with the people of the State he served so well, and which honored him so greatly, and of the Nation whose rights, honor, and power he was such an uncompromising defender, and of the thousands of personal friends who loved him we cast upon his bier the faithful tribute of affection and high regard, and so bid him a last farewell.

Mr. ROBESON. From rock-bound coast and rugged mountain-side, from quiet farms and busy villages, and from her thronging centers of culture and of trade, New England pours her eager sons along the path of every progress. From the elevating influence of her noble social system, from her clustering churches, from her teeming school-houses, from her free town-meetings, they carry the impress of their New England origin, education, and character into every field which human ambition dares to invade or human energy avails to conquer. What manner of men they are, who, born of Puritan stock and inheriting the energies and capacities of Puritan character, develop them in the free air and under the boundless horizon of the prairies, and amid the activity and vitality of pioneer and frontier life, we know and the world is beginning to realize. Carrying with them everywhere the mental and moral qualities of their New England origin, they develop them in scenes of more intense vitality and amid the struggles of larger elements of natural force. Thus is produced a race uniting in themselves almost every condition of physical, intellectual, and political development; a race which makes a new and mighty element of power, challenging the attention and commanding the respect of the world.

These reflections are suggested by a picture as remarkable as any in the history of our country, and which would not be possible in any other land or under different conditions of government and political progress. Amid the crowd of emigrants who in the earlier years of the present century turned their backs upon home and birthplace in New England to seek their fortunes in the growing West were two young men, born in the little State of New Hampshire, who both finally settled in the beautiful city of Detroit, which, sitting like a queen on the banks of its great highway, has for so many years commanded the trade and traffic of the Northwest. Their stern New England mother had thrown off each in turn as the northern eagle soaring from her eyrie shakes in mid-air her frightened fledglings from her back to try for themselves their new-grown pinions in the upward flight and dare alone the splendor and the danger of the sky. The elder of the two was among the earlier settlers of the northern region, a soldier in its defense, and a pioneer in its development. Reaching at an early period conspicuous official position, his strong character and great abilities swayed to his own views the principles and the actions of the people among whom he lived. Representing in the Senate of the United States the great State of Michigan, he was for many years the political champion and leader of opinion in the Northwest.

The other, whose recent death is the occasion of these ceremonies, leaving at a later period the scenes of his youth, carried with him to his adopted State the same inborn qualities of energy and strength of character, enriched by the same intense love of his country, but molded in a different school of political faith, developing into different ideas of political policy, government, and progress. The one was the veteran champion and representative of the older democracy; the other soon became a leader of the new republicanism. In the struggle of parties which often convulsed the State they were ever representative antagonists, and as one of the early fruits of the great political revolution which swept the Northwest, the younger was elected to the seat of the elder in the Senate of the United States, a position which he held until a very recent period, keeping in the hands of these two sons of New Hampshire, almost unbroken from the time of its organization, the senatorial power and influence of the great State of Michigan.

For many years antagonists in political strife, rivals for political office, and representatives of different political policy, the great peril which threatened their common country brought them at last together, and, uniting them in a common endeavor for its rescue and safety, engendered a personal friendship which was broken only by the death of the elder; and to-day Lewis Cass and ZACHARIAH CHANDLER sleep almost side by side beneath the soil of the great Commonwealth which they both loved so well, which was the scene of their political rivalry, and which honored each in his turn with its confidence and highest trust. Their graves, like those in the old cemetery at Portland, where lie face to face the commanders of the Enterprise and the Boxer, cover indeed the remains of rival champions, but represent now quiet after strife, equality after rivalry, and the utter subjection of all human power to His will "whose mercy endureth forever."

The Senate of which Mr. CHANDLER became a member was as remarkable as any which has been known in the history of our country. The principles involved in its contests were those upon which depended the future character and direction of our Government and its influence for all time; and the men to whom, in the providence of God, their illustration was committed were worthy of their high trust.

The political party to which he belonged was at that time greatly in the minority in the Senate, and many of its members had, like himself, been chosen for the qualities which mark the courage of high convictions rather than for official or governmental experience, but like him they brought to the contest, energy, activity, and constancy, noble impulses of duty, the courage of lofty purposes, clear conception of the ends to be finally reached, and a fixed determination to dare, to do, and to suffer all that might be necessary for their accomplishment.

It would not become the occasion to recount the many struggles, trials, and triumphs of that great contest; it is sufficient now to say that Mr. CHANDLER brought to the side of his party the most valuable and decisive qualities of mind and heart. Vigorous and energetic, yet thoughtful and astute; of large views, yet with clear conceptions; of liberal ideas, yet with fixed principles; of high aspirations, yet with concentrated purposes—these were qualities born on New England soil indeed, but developed on broader fields and amid the struggle of more elemental forces. A heart open as day to every manly sympathy; a steadfastness which did not yield, and a faith which never faltered; a simplicity which told of honor, and a courage which was born of freedom—these were qualities of heart which belonged to the man himself, which enshrined him in the love of friends, and took hold on the affections of the people.

During the whole period of our acquaintance, my own association with Mr. CHANDLER was intimate, close, and confidential. Of his senatorial career I need not speak further; his record is written on the pages of his country's history. But of the closer and more confidential relations of Cabinet life and duty in which we were associated together I may bear special testimony. There, as everywhere, he exhibited the highest qualities of character and of heart; he was at once liberal to every person, just to every interest, and constant to every duty; his every action was honor and all his endeavors were for the right; and each day he grew more and more in the love and in the respect of his chief and of his associates.

In the fullness of his strength, in the plenitude of his influence, in the richest development of his faculties, clad with the regalia of a nation's confidence, and covered with love as with a garment, he has fallen in the night, and the scenes which once knew him so well will know him no more forever. The successes to which he contributed will endure for others, but the mind enriched and developed, the enlightened heart, and the elevated spirit which achieved them are lost to his country and his friends just as, equipped and trained for severer struggles, the veteran turned to new conquests. Here we must pause; we can go no further. This is the "be-all and the end-all here;" beyond is "the undiscovered country, from whose bourn no traveler returns;" but here is the moral and a lesson: Life is far too short to realize to man more than the merest possibilities of his nature. The heart is full of aspirations, and the mind of possibilities which are not, which cannot be, realized in this world. At each step which we take forward we see nearer and clearer the far-off goals, toward which the spirit aspires, but which human ambition may never reach, but, like the stars which shine down the long avenues of heaven, their endless line of "lights on lights beyond" tells like prophecy the immortal destiny of man.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, conscious as I am of the exalted place Senator CHANDLER held in the hearts of the people whom I have the honor in part to represent, I should feel that I had disregarded the wishes of my immediate constituents should I permit this occasion to pass without attempting to give expression to their high appreciation of his character and their profound sense of irreparable loss.

I am not apprehensive, sir, that I shall expose myself to the imputation of fulsome eulogy of the dead, or unjust detraction from the merits of the living, by declaring that no citizen of Michigan stood higher in the public regard, or could, by his death, have so disturbed the public repose, as the distinguished Senator whose sudden demise has given occasion for this solemn observance. That he occupied a foremost place in the State's esteem is evidenced by the prolonged and illustrious service to which her partiality repeatedly called him; that he is sincerely lamented is attested by the manifestations of public and private grief attending his imposing obsequies.

The qualities of head and heart which thus endeared him to the people of Michigan were so conspicuous that they readily suggest themselves to every one familiar with his public career, for the prominent and distinguishing features of his character were so pronounced that they could be neither disguised nor misunderstood.

Chiefest among these was his unchallenged honesty. Holding, for a quarter of a century, some of the most responsible positions in the gift of his State and the nation, whether participating in the legislation of the country or in the administration of its laws, his course was ever marked by the same unswerving integrity. Provoking, as he did, by his pronounced partisanship the fiercest assaults of his political antagonists, yet no adversary was ever bold enough to attack his official integrity or impugn his personal honor.

Nor would he brook dishonesty in others. It is said, that when Secretary of the Interior, becoming satisfied that a certain bureau in that Department needed thorough renovation, he sent for the head of the division and directed the immediate dismissal of twelve of his most prominent subordinates. The chief of the bureau expostulated with the Secretary and finally declared that it would be impossible to transact the business of his department without their assistance. "Very well, sir," replied the Secretary, "then the business of your department will be suspended; for unless you make these removals by four o'clock this afternoon, that branch of the public service will be closed." It is needless to add that the orders of the Secretary were immediately executed and the subordinates discharged.

If it be true that "an honest man is the noblest work of God," then ZACHARIAH CHANDLER was one of nature's master-pieces.

> "He never sold the right to serve the hour,"
> Or paltered with eternal truth for power.

Then, again, he was a man of matchless courage. Positive in his convictions, he was bold in their advocacy. His course of action once determined upon, supported by an approving conscience, no fear of popular disfavor or personal discomfiture could swerve him from his fixed purpose. No matter what the emergency, he was always equal to it. Where others doubted, he was confident; where others faltered, he was immovable; where others queried, he affirmed. Whether engaged in preserving the nation's life or sustaining the national credit, whether in the Senate or in the cabinet, he was the same fearless, intrepid leader. There was no error, however popular, he would not assail—no truth, however despised, he would not champion. As illustrative of his indomitable courage in great emergencies, it is related of him that immediately after the battle of Bull Run, when the Republic seemed tottering to its downfall, he called upon the President to advise with him in relation to the exigencies of the hour. Mr. Lincoln was in despair, and met Mr. CHANDLER with the exclamation: "The country is lost! what shall we do?" "Do," responded the stalwart Senator, "call immediately for three hundred thousand volunteers." "But will the people respond?" questioned the Executive. "Yes, sir, if you were to make it a million." And it is said that he never quit the executive chamber until he bore the order from Mr. Lincoln to Secretary Stanton directing the summons. He was one of the few public men who, in the consideration of great questions, not only had positive convictions, but the moral courage to avow them, regardless alike of public opinion or personal consequences. It mattered not how popular a measure might be, or how much its advocacy might enhance the chances of party success, Senator CHANDLER never yielded his convictions for a momentary advantage. It mattered not how exalted any man might be in the public regard, if Senator CHANDLER believed him unworthy of the advancement he would not hesitate to assail him. And he never resorted to temporary expedients to achieve temporary success or allay popular clamor.

> Unpracticed he to fawn or seek for power
> By doctrines fashioned to the varying hour.

And, finally, he was faithful to every public duty and true to his friends. Treachery found no place in his character. He never betrayed a public trust or a personal friend.

Fortunate will we be if it can be said of us when we are gone, as it can be truthfully declared of him: He was an honest public servant, a fearless champion of the right, and a faithful friend.

Mr. HAWLEY. I gladly take a few moments to manifest my sorrow for the death of Mr. CHANDLER, and my high respect for the many pronounced and praiseworthy elements of his character. It was a frank, brave, manly, strong nature. Whatever he loved he loved indeed; when he hated at all he blazed. When he enlisted for a cause he gave it his soul and mind and body. He furnishes an eminent example among a multitude of men stalwart in all things—physical, mental, and moral—who have swarmed westward for a century and built up an empire. He carried with him the traditions of his New England home. His force and good judgment bore him upward in business; his honesty secured him abundant trust and confidence; his public spirit compelled him to enter public life. He rejoiced in the inspirations of conflict, and had a righteous contempt for neutrals. "Some say there is a God; some say there is no God." Mr. CHANDLER would never have said, "the truth lies between the two extremes." A man once prominent in American letters and politics, who failed to secure the success in public life to which his intellectual abilities apparently entitled him, described, as lessening his availability for political leadership, his irresistible tendency to see in the strongest light the arguments and sentiments of his opponents, and to permit his vigor of action to be modified accordingly. Mr. CHANDLER never suffered through any such weakness. He was never in danger of being turned into a pillar of salt.

Willing enough to concede that his opponents might be sincere, he would rejoice in that sincerity as giving promise of a finer battle. It would never have occurred to him that it ought to save them from defeat.

His roughness and readiness provoked criticism. Men more scholarly, judicial, deliberate, and many-sided, and by reason thereof often less valuable in times of stormy action, were apt to undervalue Mr. CHANDLER. But his advice and judgment were sound in the startling crisis of war, and, while it was not a surprise to those who really knew him, it was a great satisfaction to see him become in time of peace a Secretary of the Interior, pointed to as a model of integrity and vigor.

His opponents made a common mistake in deeming the sledge-hammer combatant lacking in the graces of friendship. He hated many things; I do not think he hated any man. He had lived through enough of rude conflict in private and public to know that we may judge opinions and principles by the light we have, but should estimate men by the light they have.

All the time he lived he was indeed a live man. And though he be dead the magnetism of his nature is here to-day, and will be felt for generations.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, the late Senator CHANDLER attained political eminence and secured the admiration of the American people because he had and exhibited in action some of the best traits of an attractive human character. He had integrity, honesty, patriotism, boldness and moral bravery. These qualities were the pillars upon which, in a large degree, rested his national fame. They gave him success in each great theater of his life.

When his remains awaited burial in the city of Detroit, his fellow-citizens, in large numbers and irrespective of party, in their unanimously adopted resolutions, made conspicuous these shining characteristics. His honesty, his uprightness, his uncorruptedness in the transactions of life were in daily play, and came to be the universally conceded qualities of the man.

This animating and controlling principle greatly augmented, without doubt, the force of those other traits to which reference has been made. He did not yield to the temptations which come to men willing to acquire gain and place by the use of deceptive and otherwise unworthy methods. As he hated fraud, he demanded a clean record, a full exposure of all the motives which shaped and impelled the actions of men. His denunciations of men who in action were not what their professions would make them, were signally severe. For such men, he had no excuses. If he was intolerant, his honesty made him so. There was no sham in this great distinguishing element in his character. It was firmly rooted and unceasingly operative. It did not leave him when he passed from private into public life. During his eighteen years of service in the Senate of the United States, much of it opening paths to personal profit, which touched and hurt other men, he made such a record for honesty, in its largest signification, that it left in the background and to be forgotten forever whatever of faults, if any, may have touched his personal character.

After a short retirement from the Senate, he became the Secretary of the Interior. He was exempt from assaults at no period in his political career. They were renewed when he returned to Washington to assume the duties of an executive office and take his place in the Cabinet of President Grant. These attacks, however, never reached his integrity. If they had been made with that view, he could have used the words of Shakespeare and said:

> There is no terror in your threats:
> For I am arm'd so strong in honesty,
> That they pass by me as the idle wind,
> Which I respect not.

If the history of the lamented Senator be written, no pages in it will be brighter or more illustrative of the man than those which shall set forth the thorough and needed reforms which he wrought in the Department of the Government over which he presided. Civil service with him had an honest meaning. It must have its illustration in the full labor of men loyal to the Government and competent to do the work assigned them. He hated civil-service rules, because in their practical operation they were too often a cheat. Not long had he served in this new capacity before there came from every quarter the free and hearty acknowledgment that he possessed executive and administrative abilities of a high order.

The congressional legislation of 1854 brought the subject of our eulogies from his comparative obscurity and led the way to his long and eventful public career. The republican party was born of that legislation. In the formation of the party he took an early and conspicuous part. In after years, and indeed till his death, he was in it a wise and sagacious adviser and supporter. His consummate ability in party organization kept him for many years at the head of the national republican committee.

The repeal of the Missouri compromise he regarded as a blow aimed at the life of the nation. This act aroused into the intensest activity his sublime love for the Union. From this hour his voice was heard. The directness and severity with which he spoke of measures which he deemed hostile to the public good, may be charged to his ardent love of country. He was an extreme partisan because he sincerely believed his party alone could save and best serve the Republic. He did not think it possible to save it by any other political organization or agency. His uncompromising devotion to the Union would not suffer him to consider for an hour any terms of compromise or conciliation. The sincerity and honesty of his motives were never questioned by those who knew him. His vast labors for the Government during the war, and the soldiers who were standing against its enemies, were inspired by a deep and generous patriotism. No man will do him justice who does not credit to it all he did and sacrificed for it when its life was in peril. His words were indeed barbed, but his nature would not suffer the coinage of any other.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that one of the marked traits in the Senator's character was his boldness. His honesty made it impossible for him to evade or conceal. He did not hesitate at any time or in any place to utter his convictions or use right names. He spoke as he felt. Words with him were put to their legitimate use. Frankness marked the man and was the offspring of his honesty. He said what he thought the occasion required. It would not have been possible for him to do less and be himself. He was rugged in conviction and in utterance. His speeches in the Senate during the extra session of last year, were charged with the severest denunciations, for they came of the views which he had entertained concerning the war and its chief actors. He could not have made them otherwise.

It may be said that the Senator, though sincere, was extreme and daring, yet such a man is safer in the councils of a nation than a timid man, for the latter is quite certain to surrender his whole cause WHEN some crisis is reached and when the highest order of courage is the stern necessity of the hour. The brave man will never deceive either friend or foe.

The last speeches of Senator CHANDLER in the Senate brought him invitations to address the people in many States of the Union. He spoke many times in Ohio, Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Wisconsin, and Illinois during the months of August, September, and October. Vast crowds greeted him wherever he spoke. The masses loved his directness of speech. They honored him for what he was and what he said. Faneuil Hall resounded with the loud and long applause which followed his words. His reception in every place was an ovation.

Turning his face homeward, he reached the city of Chicago on the 31st of October. Here, when the echoes of his last eloquent appeal to the thousands who here so enthusiastically heard him, had scarcely died away, the spirit of the bold Senator, the incorruptible statesman and the earnest patriot, took its flight. Here ended a life grandly useful and heroic. This generation cannot forget its greatness, and coming generations will admire its singular devotion to the Republic.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Speaker, in the death of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER a great political party has lost one of its recognized leaders, and the nation one of her most distinguished sons. His life and acts have been interwoven with the history and progress of the State of Michigan and of this nation during the last twenty-five years.

The life of Senator CHANDLER adds another name to that long list of men in this country who, by dint of persevering application and energy, have raised themselves from the lower ranks of industry to eminent positions of usefulness and influence in the nation. The presidential chair and the Halls of Congress have contained many such self-raised men—fitting representatives of the industrial character of the American people—and it is to the credit of our institutions that such men have received due recognition and honor at the hands of the people.

Mr. CHANDLER'S education was limited to that of the common schools and an academy of his native State, New Hampshire.

In 1833, at the age of twenty years, he removed to the city of Detroit, and soon after engaged in the mercantile business, in which he was very successful.

His public life began by his election to the office of mayor of his adopted city in the year 1851. He was in 1852 brought prominently before the people of Michigan as the whig candidate for governor. Although the contest was a hopeless one he made a spirited and energetic canvass, and established a prestige in the State which he ever afterward enjoyed. From this time to the day of his death Mr. CHANDLER took an active interest in the politics of his adopted State and the nation. In the winter of 1856–'57 he was elected to the United States Senate, to succeed Lewis Cass, being the first republican Senator from Michigan.

In the Senate he took hold of his work with the same energy and directness that had characterized him as a successful merchant and business man. He saw the coming greatness of the Northwest and devoted himself chiefly to the commerce and industries of the lake region, becoming so thoroughly acquainted with the subject that he was soon considered an authority on all questions touching the interests or development of that part of the country.

He especially demanded for the Northwest a place on the Committee on Commerce in the Senate, a committee of which he was afterward chairman for so many years. It is said that the first bill he ever presented was one to improve the Saint Clair Flats by deepening the channel over them. This bill, and his next to deepen Saint Mary's River, he pushed with that untiring energy which marked his course afterward in such matters. During the debate in the Senate on the Saint Clair bill Mr. CHANDLER said, "I want to see who is friendly to the great Northwest and who is not; for we are about making our last prayer here. The time is not far distant when, instead of coming here and begging for our rights, we shall extend our hands and take the blessing. After 1860 we shall not be here as beggars."

Time will not permit us on this occasion to follow him minutely in his successful career in the Senate. Long identified with the interests and prosperity of Michigan, no man has accomplished more for her material interests than Mr. CHANDLER. Outside of political and party lines he has been of great service to the State, and his death is there considered a great calamity. He will fill an honorable page in the history of his country's struggles and triumph over human slavery. He hated oppression wherever he found it, and counted no consequence in denouncing the oppressor.

Senator CHANDLER was a man of decided convictions and utterances. His boldness and frankness of speech often led to a misconception of his character, and made the impression that he was tyrannical and vindictive. His nature was eminently genial, tender, and sympathetic. He felt keenly the wrongs of others, and was never more outspoken than when defending the cause of the weak and oppressed.

Pending rebellion, he was loyal, hopeful, helpful, and a military division in himself, to help Lincoln, Grant, and Stanton. He was devoted to the Union in its hour of peril. His earnest, persevering labors amid the darkest days of its trial and difficulty, his courage and steadfastness in the pursuit of his noble aims and purposes in the interest of the nation, were no less heroic of their kind than the bravery and devotion of the soldier whose duty and whose pride it was heroically to defend it upon the battle-field. No human being can accurately say how much of our final victory during war and reconstruction was vitally and indisputably ministered by ZACHARIAH CHANDLER. He was absolutely invincible and fearless. I wish to pay a brief tribute to the fearless independence of his character, to his integrity, his honest adherence to the principles which he believed to be right, to the rugged force of his talents; all of which made him an important element in the affairs of the nation during the last quarter of a century. Few men in this country ever wielded a stronger political influence than Senator CHANDLER. He was a man of firm convictions, and, though an ardent partisan, was just. His character was unimpeachable. Throughout his course of public life not even his bitterest opponents ever had aught to say against his honesty.

Few men have taken such a firm, deep hold on the confidence and regard of the country. His sturdy patriotism and his uncompromising loyalty carried and captivated the popular heart. He had something in his composition that compelled respect and confidence from the people. One of Napoleon's favorite maxims was, "The truest wisdom is a resolute determination." If it is a blessing to be possessed of a stout heart, then Senator CHANDLER was eminently blessed. The people of Michigan, and all who knew him, had unbounded confidence in the will-power and energy of "Old Zach," as he was familiarly called at home. I believe it is true that it is not the men of genius who move the world, and take the lead in it, but men of steadfastness and invincible determination.

Mr. CHANDLER was strong with the people because he was conspicuously one of the people, moved by their honest impulses, filled with their strong sense, and sharing their earnest convictions. There was no pretense or false show about him. He was brave, true, manly, square, and direct, and was never afraid to call things by their right names. He made no claim to polish or the art of rhetoric. He was a strong man, rather than a scholarly one; a man of great common sense; a practical rather than a brilliant statesman. His practical sagacity, his resolute will, and great courage made him a greater force than many of finer polish and larger acquirements. He was a natural leader, and no man in our history as a State ever had a more faithful following. He leaves a gap which it will be difficult to fill. Upon the nation which honored him, and the State which loved him, the news of his death fell with great suddenness and the force of an awful shock. But he could not have chosen a better time to die had he been given the power of choice, for he went in the zenith of his fame and usefulness—in the midst of activity and labor, and with the harness on. His last public utterances were for an honest government and an undivided nation.

A widespread and public sorrow on the announcement of his death attested the profound sense of the loss which the State of Michigan and the whole country sustained. Former political animosities were forgotten, and all, without distinction of politics, creed, or nativity, seemed to feel that the State and nation had lost a strong pillar.

Let us imitate his virtues and cherish his memory.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, if we were to call the roll of the dead who have fallen from the ranks of those who have mustered in this our country's Capitol, we should hear the names of many historic souls familiar to the ears of the people of all lands, and not among the least of those would be found the name of him on whose account we meet here to-day to pay a last tribute of respect.

My personal relations with the late Senator ZACHARIAH CHANDLER were limited to occasional and incidental meetings during the last two years of his life. To those who knew him well and intimately during the many years of his long, eventful, and useful life it must be left to speak of him in his social and family relations. But his public life and acts belong to the whole country; and in so far as he was the instrument of good to mankind; in so far as his life was exemplary and worthy of imitation; in so far as he was a type of American manhood and an honor to his country and race, he belongs to history.

While his life and public services may not have been singularly grand, they were transcendently great. It has often been said, with a view of detracting from individual greatness, that men only become great because they have lived and been called on to grapple with great events. It is not to be denied that great occasions develop great intellects and great men. It is also true that men who have high and responsible public duties cast on them, as a rule, meet and discharge them, often to the surprise of their friends, with singular faithfulness and ability. But in the long and eventful period in our country's history through which the lamented Senator lived many strong men faltered, hesitated, and fell.

The differences in men are rarely to be measured by their difference in natural and purely intellectual endowments; they consist more commonly in the differences in zeal, energy—physical energy—perseverance, devotion to duty, to friends and country, pride of success, love of honor, self-respect, high resolve, dauntless spirit, and, above all, a desire to do good. Senator CHANDLER possessed most if not all of these endowments, and more largely than most of the great and good men of the world.

If I were compelled to name the one leading characteristic which he was endowed with in a higher degree than another, and which ruled him in private and public affairs throughout his useful life, I should say it was heroism. Though not a warrior in the period of war, his whole life was a heroic one. Heroes are not found alone in the fiery furnace of war; they are common to the paths of peace. He possessed true heroism, "the self-devotion of genius manifesting itself in action." His was not only of that kind of heroism denoting fearlessness of danger, passive courage, ability to bear up under trials amid dangers and sufferings; nor was it only that fortitude, bravery, and valor which is essential to those who go forth to conflicts with living opponents in personal mortal combat as duelists or in battle; it was made up of that intrepidity and courage which shrinks not in the presence of appalling dangers. Senator CHANDLER was unpretentious, and as a husband, father, and friend was kind, patronizing, and gentle; but when stormy times came his brow seemed to darken, and that great body of his, which appeared to the beholder to be one of the motive forces of creation, strode fearlessly to the front, and there by common consent held sway until all danger was passed.

Many courageous men, not truly heroic, falter and fail to enter the lists when a conflict is imminent. Not so the deceased Senator. He was a leader when the times or occasions demanded true valor. It is in the lead where men fall or are sacrificed. The leaders in charging a foe are the most conspicuous marks, and they are the first to receive the manly fire of bold enemies and often the cowardly arrows of hiding foes in the rear, not unfrequently springing from the bow of envy or jealousy.

He escaped in a singular degree, and died in old age with his armor on. In a successful civil as in a successful military life—and in the eyes of an often undiscriminating public success in either is the only test of true greatness—it is easier to be led to scenes where honor and glory are won than to be one of the few who lead there.

In the bloody conflicts of war the percentage of those who cannot, if well commanded, meet the actual conflict of battle with a good show of courage is very small indeed, yet the large mass of men are physical cowards. Mr. CHANDLER had no element of cowardice in him. He was always a natural leader.

As a business man he sought out a comparatively new State and attained success by foresight, energy, and enterprise. He left a large fortune. This same foresight, energy, and enterprise he carried with him throughout his public life. He was devoted to his friends and magnanimous to his foes, but not to the latter until he was sure they were conquered.

As a political leader he was known to be a violent partisan. This came from his having no half-way convictions of duty and right. When he had work to do he struck heavy blows. He did not lightly tap a nail on the head to start it on its course, but drove it home at a single blow. He was said to be uncompromising in his character. This was unjust to him, save in all matters where his country or principle was involved. He was honest, and integrity in private and public affairs was a pole-star for his guidance. He may have erred, and doubtless did, in many things. It is only human to err. His impetuous and fiery nature may have sometimes caused him to go astray, but he was willing to make amends for any wrong he had done to another when in his power.

Like all positive men who come prominently upon the stage of life, he had not friends alone, but violent enemies. But like a giant oak that withstands the tornadoes as well as the gentler winds for a century, and grows stronger and firmer in its fiber, Senator CHANDLER grew in mental and moral stature by reason of the violence of his foes. He, like the oak, could not have flourished alone in the sunshine of life. He needed, if he did not deserve, its stormy days to prepare him for his high destiny. It has been said by another who had to bear more than seemed to be his share of violent opposition, "that he could as little afford to spare his enemies as his friends." They fitted and qualified him for better and nobler duties. Mr. CHANDLER'S body and mind were alike of the rugged, not to say rough, cast.

His light, though not such as would be called in high literary circles brilliant, yet it burned fiercely, reaching on occasions a white heat, in the presence of which his opponents withered. In debate he was fearlessly outspoken. He could take as well as give herculean blows. Better men may have lived than plain old ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, but none excelled him in love of country or of his fellow-men. For subterfuge and dodging he had a brave man's scorn. He always spoke his mind and acted boldly up to his convictions. He was for war when peace no longer seemed possible. As early as 1860 he gave it as his opinion that "a little blood-letting would be good for the body-politic." He was then for war, and in the national halls of legislation he gave his voice and votes for its rigorous prosecution.

He believed in the fiat of the emancipation which made plain Abe Lincoln's name immortal. It has been said that he was indiscreet, boisterous, and headstrong. So far as this may have been true it was because he had in great affairs absolutely no nonsense about him. As a political enemy of his has said, "He went straight for the thing in sight, and generally came off with it."

His warm and generous nature would not allow him to betray a friend or thrust an enemy in the back. If throughout his whole career his life was not one in all respects to be imitated by the young men of the country, it cannot be said that he corrupted them.

It was my fortune to meet him for a day near the close of his life. He was then on duty for a cause in which his heart and soul were enlisted, and in that cause he died. He had then entered upon his last campaign. It was bounded by no State lines. He addressed the people in Ohio on the political issues which he deemed vital to them; he flew from place to place rapidly, and was gone, and the "talking lightning" told us he was in the distant State of Massachusetts, and thundering his plain but convincing speech in Faneuil Hall to the learned men of Boston. We heard of him elsewhere in that State and in the State of New York; then came the news that he was in the far Northwest—the State of Wisconsin—pouring livid, convincing arguments out to her people. The morning papers announced that he was to address the assembled multitudes in that magic, wondrous city of Chicago on the night of October 31, 1879.

The early papers on the next day gave us his speech, but with it came the startling announcement—ZACH. CHANDLER is dead! Strong men and women mourned. His friends and foes stood dazed in the presence of the sad tidings. They did not know how to contemplate him from the stand-point of death. He died as a hero might wish to die—like a plumed knight "booted and spurred." It is fitting that here in these halls that knew him so long we should pay him a last tribute and shed copious tears to his memory. As we contemplate him dead—in his final chamber of repose—in the poet's language we may truthfully say:

> Here lurks no treason, here no envy swells,
> Here grow no damned grudges; here are no storms,
> No noise, but silence and eternal sleep.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, the name and fame of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, of Michigan, needs no heralding in this House, in this Congress, in this nation. None is more familiar to the American people; none ever more honored by the citizens of his own State.

Those of us who speak of him to-day bring our loving though mournful tribute to his memory as we pay the last official honors to one who served so long and so well in the Congress of the nation.

I may not here recall the long years of my personal friendship and regard, nor shall I venture to give expression to the emotions which crowd upon me as I remember the obligations of friendship, of kindness and encouragement which have assisted my public labors and been so pleasant in my private life.

Nor do I design to give even a sketch of the private or public life of the distinguished statesman and patriot whose untimely death we deplore.

Others, here and elsewhere, will better perform that sacred duty, and gather together the abundant material furnished by three-score years of an eventful life to instruct, enlighten, and gratify the people whom he served so long and so well.

If I am permitted to refer to some scenes and events of his life, not so likely to be mentioned by others—to allude to some remembrances of circumstances which he himself in private conversation has spoken as influencing his life and forming his character, I shall perhaps furnish some little aid to those who desire to know the peculiarities of his life and analyze the motives of his action.

Mr. CHANDLER was born December 10, 1813, in the time of our second national struggle, and the earliest impressions of his childhood and the first lessons around the New England fireside were colored by the intense patriotism which frontier life and border warfare had imparted to those who had been alike ready to fight the other States in behalf of the Hampshire grants and the rest of the world in behalf of the rights of the nation.

At the age of twenty he left the granite hills and the beautiful valleys of his native State to find a field of labor and the chances of fortune in the then far West. He brought little with him but energy, resolution, and that Puritan integrity natural to his race and unsullied through his life.

In the first flush of youth, hopeful, ambitious, undisciplined, he left the land of steady habits, settled customs, and a homogeneous people, to dwell in a region and among a people as unlike his own as could be found on the continent.

Michigan from 1612 to 1760 had been a part of New France, ruled, under French laws, by French governors, and in all respects a French people; from 1760 till 1787 under English governors and English laws; and till 1835 under various territorial governments.

In 1833 the whole population, French, English, and American, was about sixty thousand, and Detroit, the chief city and capital, less than ten thousand. To such a territory and city in 1833, at the age of twenty years, came ZACHARIAH CHANDLER to dwell among that mixed people thenceforward while he should live on earth.

I should love to linger over this transition period of his life, among the scenes and incidents and personages and events that molded and fashioned that tall, awkward, wondering, resolute White Mountain boy—then and before and afterward and always called Zach—into the merchant prince, the rich capitalist, the shrewd politician, the successful statesman, the unswerving patriot, and, better and nobler than all, the fearless advocate and bold defender of all the free institutions of his native land and of the rights and liberties of all the dwellers therein.

I would be gratified if I might embody in this grateful tribute to the memory of a friend with whom I have been familiar for more than a third of a century some record of his hopes and ambitions, his thoughts and reflections, his plans and struggles, from the hour when he stood a stranger in that old-fashioned City of the Straits till that evening when, amid the shouts and applause of many thousand citizens of a wonderful city beyond the lakes, unnamed and unknown in those days of his early manhood, he retired weary and secretly stricken to his chamber, and, when, alone—

> Nor wife, nor child,
> Nor one of all his myriad friends,
> To bid his parting soul farewell, his great spirit quit the familiar scenes of earth, and through the upper air, still vibrating with the applause of those who had just listened to his last thrilling words, sought rest in the unknown realms of immortal life!

Mr. Speaker, we have all an inward consciousness that "time and place and circumstance" are but the common names of those mysterious powers and influences and agencies that rule within and around us, to mold and fashion our mortal life; that, under the Divine economy, our nature, ever struggling with powers and principalities, with things seen and unseen, with right and wrong, with truth and error, with justice and oppression, is constantly and imperceptibly changed and fashioned and molded by all our earthly associations.

> There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
> Rough-hew them how we will.

In 1833, when this youthful wanderer made his home in Detroit, all was strange, and new, and wonderful. The quaint old city—the French habitans, gay, vivacious, exclusive; the old English families, proud, phlegmatic, reserved, not yet reconciled to their lost dominion; the remnants of Indian tribes whose fathers, if they did not themselves, remembered Pontiac, and Bloody Run, and Brownstown, and Tecumseh, and Hull's surrender, and the Thames, and who traversed the trails and portages, and floated on the waters, and traveled over lands once all their own, and who lingered continually about their favorite old home on the straits; hunters and trappers and fishermen gathered there; voyageurs who knew every coast and every portage to "far-off Athabasca" crowded the shores and loitered around in sad indolence as they heard the rushing sound of steam and saw the mysterious vessels that, without sail or paddle, usurped their dominion and occupation; sailors were there who had fought with Perry on the waters below; fur-traders who had brought thither their treasures from unknown mountains and plains; immigrants gathering from all the world; merchants from the interior and far-off West. But time would fail to give more than a passing glance at the scenes and associations into which our adventurer was plunged and amidst which his character was to be formed, his energy to be tested, his triumph to be gained.

Amid such scenes he must, of course, be earnest, resolute, almost aggressive. He must be inquiring, thoughtful, decided. He must be just and honorable in all his intercourse with this varied and peculiar population. He must be fearless and uncringing with the supercilious and haughty, affable, and cordial with his equals and friends, and bold in defense of the weak, else he would long since have gone down among the forgotten and unknown.

And such indeed were the elements of his character, predominating over all faults and foibles, illustrating many peculiarities, offensive to his opponents and sometimes incomprehensible to his friends.

I have not the time, on this occasion, to illustrate the different phases of his character from actual events in his life. His honesty and personal integrity have never been assailed or questioned.

Never in the varied transactions of mercantile or commercial life has his good name been tarnished. In the fever heat of political warfare no charge of corruption has pointed to him.

There was a time in the late political contest when his pride and ambition and the crowning wish of his life looked to a return to his long-honored place in the Senate, when he was told secretly by an old and trusted friend that if he would give his influence to aid in securing a certain political appointment to a friend of one who could secure the result he could be elected. With an emphatic gesture, he replied: "I have lived among the people of Michigan for almost half a century an honest man, and I will never secure my election even by a promise which at another time I might be willing to make voluntarily."

Equally characteristic of the man was his celebrated letter to the governor of his State, so much criticised, so much approved—the blood-letting letter, so called.

He saw treason spreading through the land, poisoning the fountains of justice, invading the halls of legislation, threatening the free institutions of the country, selfish, unreasoning, inexorable, gathering forces for the conflict, already arming for the strife.

What should he, the watchman on the tower, say to his people? Let the Union be destroyed? Let the Constitution be shattered? Surrender ignobly the inheritance to treason and traitors? No. War, if it must come, blood and life, if necessary, wealth and property and comfort and long years of struggle, but this Union must and shall be preserved. No surrender to traitors! No yielding to timidity! No endurance of vacillation, either in court or camp!

He spared neither high nor low, neither the head of the Army nor the subaltern in the field. He had the great courage to attack alone the management of the campaign and to change commanders. The history of his labors through the war will never be written. They are only partially known to the country, and not fully even to his friends.

When the war was over he demanded the fruits of victory—submission to the Government, freedom in spirit and in fact to the enfranchised; absolute protection to the citizen in all legal and political rights wherever the flag floats; recognition of the fidelity and valor of Union soldiers; confidence and support to the Union men of the South; suppression of violence and anarchy and kukluxism; no recognition or payment of rebel claims for losses in the war.

On these and like subjects he could not be silent. He was not vindictive. He would not yield to injustice; but, looking upon the shattered hearth-stones, the maimed and suffering soldier, and the innumerable graves of patriot citizens, he demanded the results of victory, no more, no less, and that the great struggle should close the contest, once and forever.

Mr. Speaker, the record of his life and character will be more fully made up by abler hands than mine. This time and place permit but a glance at a few of the characteristics of the man. I can but feebly echo the voice of ten thousand citizens of our mourning State in any expression of admiration for our departed statesman—of sorrow for his untimely death. In Michigan a million and a half of people are mourners. No party lines divide our citizens as we lay the tribute of respect upon his tomb. No citizen has died more universally known; none been attended to his last resting-place with more abounding sadness. The thousands who thronged the streets on the day of his funeral and endured the tempestuous winter storm for hours unmoved, as the long cortege moved "with slow funereal tread" to his final resting-place, were but the representatives of millions throughout our land who cried as of old, "Know ye not that a great man hath fallen in Israel this day?"

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, ZACHARIAH CHANDLER was born in the district I have the honor to represent. Among my constituents are the friends and associates of his early life. His birthplace, in the beautiful valley of the Merrimac, is only a short distance from my own home. There his boyhood was spent, and there he came forth to fame and fortune. His boyhood gave promise of the great character which his manhood fulfilled. From very humble beginnings, by his own energy and force of character, he worked his way to the front rank of the statesmen of his country.

He adds another and a most honorable name to the bright list of New Hampshire's illustrious sons. Proudly we bear the honor of his birth, and while his adopted State may be first, let New Hampshire be next at the memorial altar.

The Granite State believes in men like Senator CHANDLER. We believe in a statesmanship of positive ideas. Not only do we honor his political principles, but for his very nature we loved the man—for his open, generous, philanthropic nature; always exercising his great aggressive vigor against the wrong, always taking the part of the weak and oppressed.

An outline of his busy and eventful life has already been given by those who have preceded me, and I purpose only to offer a few suggestions on the character of the man whom we have met this day to honor. Of his abilities there can be but one opinion. All the requisites of a great executive he certainly possessed—decision, method, energy, self-reliance. He was not merely a great executive; to his capacity as such was added that broader vision, that greater originality, in short, that statesmanship which belongs to great administrators. The executive need evolve only methods, the administrative measures. Tried by any theory, or measured by his own great success, Senator CHANDLER'S abilities lifted him to the dignity of a great administrator. This might rest alone upon his business success; it might rest upon his management of the Interior Department for the brief period he was at its head; it might rest upon his republican leadership of the last twenty years, a leadership that was more and more acknowledged until at his death it almost approached supremacy. This capacity for administration was shown in all these relations, and even in his legislative career it was this faculty which comes oftenest to the front. He possessed the qualities of a legislator of no mean or secondary order; he was invaluable in the committee, but he was not the less of consequence upon the floor of the Senate.

Trace the history of this country through a long and most memorable period, and constantly as you may see his hand in its measures you as constantly hear his voice in its debates. He was bold and aggressive; endowed by nature with that clearness of logic, that directness, intensity, and vigor of statement that rendered him no "unknown quantity" in debate. Any attempted analysis of his character seems superfluous, his every quality is so well known to the world. He has been prominently before the nation for a quarter of a century—an era measured by its great achievements, unparalleled in the annals of mankind; all the while closely identified with the legislation of his country and with the leadership of a great party which has done more for human liberty than any other known to history.

The one particular characteristic of the man was his strength. Other men were more finished. We have many finished men, but few really strong ones. He was a man whose every thought was strength, and with whom to think was to do. Strength of conviction, strength of purpose, strength of methods, strength of statement—these were his in a supreme degree. History will never lose the impress of his character.

He has been accused of a too zealous partisanship, but there is no warrant for this charge. True he was no "half-and-half;" there was no duplicity, no dissimulation in his composition. If he believed at all, it was with his whole great heart; and with his intensity of conviction he may have been wont to regard success as a duty; but his enemies, if such he had, will not accuse him of unworthy and dishonorable means.

His methods were bold, as they were vigorous. He struck hard, but he struck openly. Indeed his whole nature precludes suspicion. There were no dark or secret traits in his character. He did everything openly and above-board, and despised treachery, cant and hypocrisy as only he had the scorn to despise them. With all his tremendous earnestness, he was yet a chivalrous and generous antagonist; generous as he was in all the relations of life.

His character was of the kind to which generosity constitutionally belonged, for his faults were only those which belong to the warmest natures.

Altogether he was one of those men who make history, and stamp their impress upon the age in which they live; a man whose fame is still destined to increase like that of every true statesman whose work is grounded in conviction.

History will rank him among the most eminent of those whose names are inseparably associated with the cause of human rights.

Time has already vindicated his prescient radicalism, and posterity will place him with the heralds who have gone before their fellows to proclaim a better day.

In the official career of Senator CHANDLER, from the beginning to the close of his public life, we have a realization of the poet's earnest prayer when he sang:

> God give us men; a time like this demands
> Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands;
> Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
> Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
> Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
> Men who can stand before a demagogue
> And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking
> Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
> In public duty and in private thinking.

Mr. BARBER. Mr. Speaker, it did not occur to me that I should take part in these proceedings until the resolutions of the Senate were read in this Hall this afternoon. I rise now from a sense of duty. I should do injustice to my own feelings, and I am sure to the feelings of a very large number of the residents of the city I have the honor to represent in part on this floor, should I remain silent on this occasion. I come not, however, with any elaborate eulogy. My acquaintance with Senator CHANDLER was very brief. I saw him for the first time in March last, at the extra session. My contact with him was but slight. I cannot, therefore, speak of him either from long acquaintance or intimate relations. But it does so happen that the last great speech made by the Senator was delivered in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent. On the evening of the delivery of that speech I called upon him at the Grand Pacific Hotel in Chicago. I had a cordial greeting—a long and a pleasant interview. As I recall his stalwart form, and bluff, hearty manner, I feel like exclaiming,

> And shall I see his face again,
> And shall I hear him speak?

I went with him to the hall, I sat upon the platform, I saw him face as fine a political audience as was ever assembled together, and I heard him deliver one of the grandest speeches ever uttered upon this continent. I shall not attempt to describe the enthusiasm of that occasion. Mr. CHANDLER had never spoken in this great city before, and he had informed one of his most intimate friends who was with him that he regarded it as the peculiar and crowning honor of his life that he had been invited to speak in the great commercial metropolis of the Northwest. He seemed to regard it as somewhat of a recognition of the position which he had at last reached in the estimation of this country. No man ever had a greater triumph. The great city of the lakes was never moved by an orator in that manner before. The echoes of that speech rung out through the Northwest like the clear, strong blast of a bugle.

I saw the Senator retire from that platform amid the thunders of applause and bearing on his brow the laurels he had won. He had given upon that occasion the most decisive evidence of oratorical power by the manner in which he moved and controlled that vast multitude assembled to hear him.

But, sir, the scene changes. On the morrow I stand by his cold and lifeless form.

> The present moment is our ain,
> The niest we never saw.

Mr. Speaker, as one of the escort I went with the remains of the distinguished dead to the city of Detroit. Amid the hush of his awe-stricken friends we laid him down. Illinois to Michigan delivered up the illustrious dead.

Mr. Speaker, among the patriotic names of this country that of Senator CHANDLER is written high up, where it may be read by all the ages. You cannot erase it without tearing from the records one of the most important chapters in the history of humanity. Glory to his memory! Peace to his ashes!

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, it cannot be too late, however late the hour, to pay our tribute of respect and affection to the memory of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER.

There is a thought in connection with his life and the history of his State which has been referred to by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] and which may be still further developed. It only lacks two years of being a full century since Lewis Cass was born, and he and ZACHARIAH CHANDLER have filled seventy-three years of that period with active, prominent public service. And through all those seventy-three years there has shone like a star in both their lives the influence of one great event.

In the stormy spring of 1861, when the foundations of the Republic trembled under the tread of assembling armies, I made a pilgrimage to the home of the venerable Lewis Cass, who had just laid down his great office as chief of the State Department, and for an hour I was a reverent listener to his words of wisdom. And in that conversation he gave me the thought which I wish to record. He said, "You remember, young man, that the Constitution did not take effect until nine States had ratified it. My native State was the ninth. It hung a long time in doubtful scale whether nine would agree; but when at last New Hampshire ratified the Constitution, it was a day of great rejoicing. My mother held me, a little boy of six years, in her arms at a window and pointed me to a great man on horseback and to the bonfires that were blazing in the streets of Exeter, and told me that the horseman was was General Washington and the people were celebrating the adoption of the Constitution." "So," said the aged statesman, "I saw the Constitution born, and I fear I may see it die."

He then traced briefly the singular story of his life. He said: "I crossed the Alleghany Mountains and settled in your State of Ohio one year before the beginning of this century. Fifty-four years ago now I sat in the General Assembly of your State of Ohio. In 1807 I received from Thomas Jefferson a commission as United States marshal which I still preserve, and am probably the only man living to-day who bears a commission from Jefferson's hand." And so, running over the great retrospect of his life and saddened by bloody prospect that 1861 brought to his mind, said, "I have loved the Union ever since the light of that bonfire and the sight of General Washington greeted my eyes. I have given fifty-five years of my life and my best efforts to its preservation. I fear I am doomed to see it perish."

But a better fate awaited both him and the Union. Another son of New Hampshire took up the truncheon of power from his failing hand, and, with the vigor of youth and liberty, maintained and defended the Union through the years of its supremest peril. ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, whose birthplace was not more than thirty miles distant from that of Lewis Cass, resumed the duty as Michigan's Senator with the vigor of young and hopeful manhood. And he pushed forward that great work until his last hour and died in the full glory of its achievement. The State of New Hampshire may look upon this day and these names we celebrate as her pride and special glory.

The great Carlyle has said that the best gift God ever gave to man was an eye that could really see; and that only a few men were recipients of this gift. I venture to add that an equally rare and not less important gift is the courage to tell just what one sees. Besides having an eye, ZACHARIAH CHANDLER was endowed in an eminent degree with the courage to tell just what he saw.

If from these seats, Mr. Speaker, every Representative should speak out the very inmost thought of the people he represents, this Hall would be luminous with the spirit and aspirations of the American people. The ruling principle of Mr. CHANDLER's life was this: that what he saw in public affairs he uttered; and having said it, stood by it—not with malice or arrogance, but with the sturdiness of thorough conviction. To a stranger he might, perhaps, appear rugged and harsh—even to cruelty; yet his heart was full of gentleness when he had satisfied his sense of duty.

As a political force Mr. CHANDLER may be classed among the Cyclopean figures of history. The Norsemen would enrol him as one of the heroes in the halls of Valhalla. They would associate him with Thor and his thunder hammer. The Romans would associate him with Vulcan and the forges of the Cyclops, who made the earth tremble under the weight of his strokes.

What man have we known who, without specially cultivating the graces of oratory, was able to condense into ten minutes a more enduring speech than the one which he delivered at the extra session of 1879? Under the pressure of his intense mind an hour of ordinary speech was condensed into a sentence.

He was not an orator in the ordinary sense of fine writing and graceful delivery; but in the clearness of his conceptions and the courage and force with which he uttered them he was a most remarkable speaker.

Somebody said long ago that "one man with a belief was a greater power than ten thousand who have only interests." Mr. CHANDLER was emphatically a man with a belief.

In the minds of most men the kingdom of opinion is divided into three territories—the territory of yes, the territory of no, and a broad, unexplored middle ground of doubt. That middle ground in the mind of Mr. CHANDLER was very narrow. Nearly all his territory was occupied by positive convictions. On most questions his mind was made up more completely than that of any man I have known.

His was an intense nature—

> Dowered with the hate of hate, the scorn of scorn,
> The love of love.

It is curious to observe that, as a general rule, long service in a legislative minority unfits men for the duties that devolve upon a majority. The business of the one is to attack, of the other to defend; of the one to tear down, of the other to build up.

The leaders of the anti-slavery struggle in this country were perhaps the most skillful in assault of any political party in our history. But when, after years of service in the minority, they came into power, but few of their prominent leaders were fit for the constructive work of maintaining an administration. Mr. CHANDLER was one of that small number who displayed in constructive legislation abilities fully equal to those which he exhibited as a member of the minority. His administration of the Interior Department was an ample vindication of his high qualities as an executive officer.

This Congress will miss him in its councils. His party and his State will greatly miss him. I know he is sincerely mourned in my own State, where within three weeks of the hour of his death I had the honor to preside over the largest political assemblage I have seen in many years. The name of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER called together that great multitude, who sat at his feet and listened with reverence and enthusiasm.

Reviewing his life and summing up his qualities, we may fitly apply to him the words which the laureate of England applied to Wellington:

> O iron nerve, to true occasion true,
> O fallen at length, that tower of strength,
> Which stood foresquare to all the winds that blew.

Mr. WILLITS. ZACHARIAH CHANDLER needs no eulogy to perpetuate his name in the State of Michigan; his nineteen years' service in the Senate of the United States is recorded in the annals of that distinguished body; and nothing that we can say to-day can add to or diminish his fame. His public like his private life was an active one and was well-known and conspicuous from the first. March 4, 1857, he succeeded in the Senate of the United States a statesman long honored by the State of Michigan; who had taken a leading part in its early history, having been its territorial governor from 1813 to 1830; who had for four years been Secretary of War under Andrew Jackson, seven years minister to France under Jackson and Van Buren, the candidate of a great party for the office of Chief Executive of the nation, Senator of the United States, and finally Secretary of State under James Buchanan. It was such a man as this ZACHARIAH CHANDLER succeeded; a man who had gathered to himself the honors of two continents, conferred dignity upon every position he had occupied, and for half a century had added leaf after leaf to the well-filled chaplet that had fallen so fittingly upon his brow. Lewis Cass was an honored name in the State of Michigan; it was a household word in the homes of the hardy pioneers who had followed him into the new State he had helped to found. Their children in like manner revered the man who had extinguished the Indian title to the lands they now occupied and had made a name historic in the annals of his country.

It was no whim that relegated Lewis Cass to private life. It was no accident that brought ZACHARIAH CHANDLER to the front instead. The people of the Peninsular State are not volatile or visionary, or forgetful of those who have shown themselves worthy of honor. There is none of the feeling exhibited by the Athenian clown, as related by Plutarch, who was tired of hearing Aristides everywhere called the Just. The State of Michigan was in no just sense unmindful of the great worth of Lewis Cass, and would have delighted to continue him in the high position he had so justly attained, if events had not conspired to render it impossible. With these events he had failed to keep himself fully abreast. There are times when public sentiment will not endure a political laggard. Lewis Cass, with all his breadth of intellect, with the experience of a statesman and the amenities of the finished scholar and gentleman, was not a positive man, was not an original man. Times were on the threshold when both of these qualities were to be needed. He was a true man at heart, loyal to his country, and so honest that, when at last he saw the fallacy of his position, he resigned his high place rather than compromise his fealty to the Union. But he was too old to fight, and he was unable to devise a plan to still the waves of the rising revolution. He had to give way to a sentiment he had been slow to perceive and utterly unable to comprehend.

Among those who had been quick to perceive the logic of events was the man whom we honor to-day. He was selected by the people of the State of Michigan to succeed Lewis Cass; not because he had had large experience in political affairs, for he had had none; not because he had culture and refinement, for he had neither, as understood in the school or the drawing-room; not because he was learned in the law, or skilled in the arts of diplomacy, for he was wont to boast that he cared for neither the abstruseness of the one nor the duplicity of the other; but he was selected because he was a strong, positive man who was in full sympathy with the revolt against the political tendencies of the party in power, and with which Lewis Cass had been identified for half a century; he was selected because he was a hearty hater of sham, an opponent of the compromises that had insidiously taken more than they had purported to give, and demanded more than the people of his State were disposed to yield; because, in the "irrepressible conflict" then impending, he was on the side of the liberty which the fathers had aspired to, but from which the sons had apostatized. In all these characteristics he was the representative of his people, who had the utmost confidence in his integrity, strong common sense, and positive adherence to the convictions born of this common sense.

From the advent of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER in the Senate of the United States to the end of his career, so unexpectedly terminated, he justified the confidence reposed in him. In the terrible conflict that convulsed the land he was an important factor, moving and controlling events and policies by the tremendous force of his will and the dictation of a restless energy. Untrammeled by the subtleties of the dialectician, he held in supreme contempt the faltering hesitation of generals and the doubting quibbles of lawyers in the face of an armed enemy. To him war had its own laws, construed by the supreme necessity of the hour and enforced by the musket; the road to essential justice was in a straight line, with no devious paths leading into an ambush. Emancipation of the negro race, prompt, decisive, by proclamation, presented to him no legal difficulties. He would utilize the force which might be let loose upon rebellion, and would for all time take from the master the slave for whose thraldom he had risen in arms against the Union; retributive justice should supplement unwarranted revolution.

He was restless over the delay of the proclamation, and when the preliminary one had been issued in September, 1862, he had none of the fears and doubts of the conservatives who protested against it as unconstitutional and sought to have it recalled. In the intervening months he visited Washington, before the final proclamation was issued, to counteract, by his presence and his positive views, the effort to have the step abandoned. On his return I met him at the depot, at my own home, and was informed exultingly: "Lincoln will stick." In all these years he seemed to comprehend by inspiration what some men never learned at all or acquired only by experience. He was not swept along by the tide; he was a component part of the tide itself—one of the forces of the times, one of the men who make history. Nevertheless, he was not much given to speech-making, or formulating statutes. The records of Congress do not show for him as much, measured by the square foot, as for the long line of disputative spouters who have gone to the same graves as the speeches they made. He would never have devised the electoral commission; he could not have done so if he would; but he supplemented it with organized facts without which its findings would have had altogether another termination.

He was a practical man not given to theories; not like Archimedes, who from principles elaborated in his study constructed his pulleys and engines, the one of which demolished the Roman fleet, and played pitch and toss with the Roman ships, but rather like Marcellus, who in his practical way captured the unguarded tower which overlooked doomed Syracuse. He was a man of affairs. By his own exertions he made an independent fortune, of which he never stole a cent. No man ever charged him with larceny, or hypocrisy, or lukewarmness to a friend, or placability to a foe, or cowardly desertion of a conviction, or compromise of a principle. He was a generous fighter, who never fired a musket with hostile intent, and yet worthily earned the title of Michigan's great war Senator. Over this title no worthy soldier on the shores of the great lakes of the Northwest has ever been captious or envious. He was the soldiers' friend, and he divided with them the high esteem in which they held all the moving spirits in the great contest in which loyal men shed so much of their loyal blood. None have mourned his untimely death more than the heroes of that war, and when the news of his death was sent to the ends of the globe on the morning of the 1st day of November last, none bowed with a heartier sorrow over the memory of the man they revered than the men who had so faithfully in the field vindicated the policy advocated by the illustrious Senator in the councils of the nation.

When the sad news reached me, I was on my journey home from Chicago. I had parted with him the midnight before. I was the last man that saw Senator CHANDLER alive. I now and shall to my latest hour recall the room in the Grand Pacific Hotel in which we had this last interview. The fire was burning low; the hotel was as silent as the grave in which he now lies; we were as much alone as if we sat by a solitary camp-fire in the pathless desert. After about twenty minutes' conversation I left him alone with Death stealing over the threshold of his room. I did not see him there, but is it my imagination that recalls footfalls as I passed along the silent, dimly lighted corridors to my own room? As the recollection comes to me, it seems as though these echoes may have been the footfalls of the grim destroyer who so closely follows the steps of mortal man. I recollect now that there was a sense of something unsaid, what it was I cannot recall, that led me to stop and turn back as if to rap at his door and speak to him again; but knowing he was weary I refrained, and went my lonely way. I can hardly wish now that I had followed the impulse, for it is unlikely that my presence would have changed the purpose of that Providence that holds the issues of life and had then marked him for death; but who knows what parting word might have been said? Who knows but the impulse I had may have been only a response to one he himself had, and which had spoken to me as spirit talketh to spirit, calling for some word of sympathy, some kind remembrance? But he is gone, and I shall never know whether he called or not till we again meet face to face. Till then I can only join with the multitude of mourners in lamenting the great loss we all sustained in the loss of a great man, and in laying this last token upon his grave.

I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The question being taken on the resolutions, they were adopted unanimously; and in obedience to the second resolution the House (at six o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) adjourned.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting letters from the Chief of Engineers and Colonel John Newton, Corps of Engineers, relative to the improvement of Harlem River, New York, as provided by the river and harbor acts of June 18, 1878, and March 3, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the memorial of Daniel Mitchell and others, citizens of Illinois and soldiers in the late war, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KERNAN. I present the petition of Drexel, Morgan & Co., and other citizens of New York, who are not claimants, praying for the passage of a law, as speedily as can be done properly, authorizing the distribution of the moneys remaining of the Geneva award fund, for the reason that to their knowledge very many citizens of the United States suffered great loss by the acts of the so-called confederate cruisers, and, although the Government was paid by Great Britain, they have not received indemnity. They therefore pray that there shall be legislation by Congress which will give to all rightful claimants upon that fund an immediate and convenient opportunity to present their claims to some properly constituted tribunal. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. I present the petition of S. W. Carey and others, citizens of New York, who are claimants under the Geneva award, and the petition of Dunharris, Nephew & Co., and 28 others, citizens of New York, who are not claimants, both making the same prayer for speedy legislation to provide for the distribution of the Geneva award fund. I move their reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The letter was read and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, as follows:

ORANGEBURGH, S. C., January 26, 1880.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to call your attention to the omission in Senator BRUCE'S bill of the two most advanced and prominent South Carolina institutions for the higher education of the colored race—the South Carolina Agricultural College and Mechanics' Institute, and the Claflin University, both of Orangeburgh, South Carolina.

For convenience, the two institutions at present unite in the work of instruction, but they have distinct faculties, distinct property, and are under distinct boards of trustees.

Claflin University has a faculty of five professors and instructors and six acres of ground and a fine college building.

The State Agricultural College has a faculty of four professors and one hundred and thirty acres of ground. The college building was destroyed by fire, and for this reason we use the Claflin building and give them the benefit of our improved farm, and the work of instruction is combined. In the two institutions, embracing a college of liberal art, a scientific and mechanical course, and a normal school, there are two hundred and sixty students. Please help us to share in the fund.

Truly yours,

S. DIBBLE,
Chairman Executive Committee, State Agricultural College, University of South Carolina.

Hon. M. C. BUTLER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BALDWIN presented the petition of Merrick, Fowler & Esseltyne, Gillett & Hall, Balch & Morton, T. W. Palmer, and 45 other business men and firms of Detroit, Michigan, praying for the appointment of a marine statistician whose duty it shall be to annually compile statistics of the loss of life and property throughout the lake region, and the valuation thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I present the petition of Alfred H. Love and several hundred citizens, representing various States, on the subject of what may be termed the peace policy, praying for the appointment of a commission to negotiate with other nations in regard to international arbitration. As the petition is very short and the whole country is interested in the subject, I ask that it be read.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the success of the Geneva arbitration and numerous settlements of difficulties between states and nations by similar peaceable means have been highly satisfactory; and

Whereas Congress adopted a joint resolution, June 17, 1874, authorizing and requesting the President of the United States to negotiate with civilized powers in regard to international arbitration, and for the establishment of an international system, whereby matters in dispute between different governments may be adjusted without recourse to war; and

Whereas Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, in his inaugural address recommended a tribunal of arbitration: Therefore,

We earnestly but respectfully petition that a commission be appointed to negotiate with such governments as may be induced to unite therewith, and thus secure the practical adoption of these propositions, which have already received the sanction of several European powers, and which we are convinced will redound to happiness, prosperity, peace, and good-will among the nations.

Mr. CALL presented the petition of T. J. Green and others, citizens of Columbia County, Florida, praying for an amendment of the patent laws so that the manufacturer and vendor may alone be responsible for the infringement of patent-rights; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

A bill (H. R. No. 3966) to carry into effect the resolution of Congress adopted on the 29th day of October, 1781, in regard to a monumental column at Yorktown, Virginia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3968) for the relief of certain actual settlers on the Kansas trust and diminished reserve lands in the State of Kansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 3980) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the name of Della Benner, widow of the late Lieutenant Hiram H. Benner, Company C, Eighteenth Infantry; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 189) legalizing the health ordinances and regulations for the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 891) to locate and purchase a new site for the United States Naval Observatory, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of William H. Newman and L. A. Von Hoffman be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Isaac Lindsey, praying for an extension of patent for weaving hair-cloth, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Patents.

On motion of Mr. SAULSBURY, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the American Grocer Association be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the papers in the case of George Heard, filed at the last Congress, be taken from the files in the office of the Secretary and placed upon the table to accompany the bill (S. No. 309) for the relief of George Heard, which has been favorably reported from the Committee on Public Lands, so that they can be used in the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

AWARDS OF VENEZUELAN COMMISSION.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President, if not incompatible with the public interests, be requested to inform the Senate if any money has been paid by the government of Venezuela on the awards of the mixed commission organized under the provisions of the treaty of the 25th April, 1866, between the United States and that republic, and, if any sum has been so paid, when the payment was made, the sum paid, and whether it has been distributed to the persons entitled to receive it, and if not so distributed, the reasons therefor; and also to furnish copies of the correspondence during the year 1879 between the governments of Venezuela and the United States relative to said awards.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think there is a word or two omitted, which are used as a matter of usual form in addressing the President of the United States. The resolution reads, "if not incompatible with the public interests." That would leave us to be as much the judge as he. The usual phrase is, "if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests." I suggest that correction.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have no objection to the amendment at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose it is a mere accidental slip.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution was agreed to.

NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senate to consider at this time the bill (S. No. 1094) to incorporate the National Education Association.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. This is a pretty serious matter, proposing to incorporate people all over this country and not in the District of Columbia. I would rather the bill should not be considered to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois objects, and that takes the bill over in the morning hour.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will make a suggestion, which I think will facilitate business very much, that bills not on the printed Calendar be not called up until we have a new Calendar printed. My attention was called to this bill, but it was not on the printed Calendar and I could not tell when it would come up. I hope that such bills will not be called up, and I shall be compelled to object to most of them if they are called up before they appear on the printed Calendar, when we can have an opportunity of examining them, see whether we have any objection to them or not, and then can make an intelligent objection.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 165) to consummate the resolution of the Continental Congress of October 4, 1777, and erect a monument to the memory of Brigadier-General Herkimer, as therein directed—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 2649) to authorize the Comptroller of the Currency to issue $500 in new notes to the National Bank of Pontiac, Illinois, to replace a like amount which have never been signed—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 2914) to authorize the President to reserve from sale or other disposition certain timber lands in the State of California, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (H. R. No. 2817) giving the consent of Congress to an agreement or compact entered into between the States of New York and Vermont respecting the boundary between said States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 3980) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the name of Della Benner, widow of the late Lieutenant Hiram H. Benner, Company C, Eighteenth Infantry—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 3966) to carry into effect the resolution of Congress adopted on the 29th day of October, 1781, in regard to a monumental column at Yorktown, Virginia, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 3968) for the relief of certain actual settlers on the Kansas trust and diminished reserve lands in the State of Kansas—to the Committee on Public Lands.

DISTRICT HEALTH ORDINANCES.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 189) legalizing the health ordinances and regulations of the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, having had the same subject before them, to ask that the House joint resolution be amended in a single respect and that it be put upon its passage this morning. I ask that the resolution be reported.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee asks for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be referred. It involves too much, I think, to be passed at once.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me to make a statement, I think his objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. A recent decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia settles the question that these health ordinances cannot be enforced. The health officer and the commissioners of the District of Columbia urge the immediate adoption of this joint resolution, because of the fact that, not being able to enforce a single one of these ordinances, the health officer says there is great danger of a spread of the epidemic of small-pox in the city. They are ordinances that have been enforced here for the last five years or more, and upon such examination as I have been able to give them I am inclined to think that they are all worthy of adoption, except a single one that I propose to except from the joint resolution by an amendment. In addition to this, if it is legitimate to refer to what is going on at the other end of the Capitol, there is a revisal of the laws of the District of Columbia now pending there, in the form of a bill that deals with this whole subject, and at no distant day that measure will come to the attention of this body for its consideration, when whatever there may be in these ordinances will be revised and the final action of the Senate taken upon the subject.

I will send to the Clerk's desk, if the Senate will indulge me, the communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia and the health officer, which speak better than I can of the necessity of the case, in regard to which I feel no personal interest, I having been instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to make the motion that I have made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have listened with great interest to what the Senator has said, but I have seen so much of rapid legislation relating to the District of Columbia, a great deal of which has been vastly worse than the small-pox, that I think I should rather run the risk of the small-pox for twenty-four hours than the risk of "going it blind" in making by act of Congress a code of health laws for the District that none of us have seen except the committee. I have great confidence in the committee and I have no doubt I shall entirely agree to everything they have recommended, but I do not think there is such an extreme public danger of the spread of the small-pox (that is said to have been here for some months) just now on account of the action of the supreme court of the District of Columbia to warrant us in taking a step of this extraordinary importance.

We would make into a law, if we should pass the joint resolution now, all these ordinances, which are not before us, and they would become the penal laws of Congress in force in this District, and put powers more or less vast into the hands of this small body of men. Before I make myself responsible to the inhabitants of this District for such a species of criminal law, I want to see it. I do not think the delay of having this proposed legislation in print so that we may be able to look at the ordinances, will be of great danger in respect of the spread of any epidemic disease here. I am sure I shall be quite ready to assist the committee in going forward with the matter tomorrow or any other time when we shall have an opportunity to see what this proposition is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the communication of the commissioners printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 26, 1880.

SIR: The commissioners have the honor to forward to your committee, with their approval, the accompanying letter of the health officer of the District requesting the passage of a joint resolution to legalize the health ordinances, and thus relieve him of the embarrassments he now encounters in his efforts to enforce them.

By order of the board.

Very respectfully,

J. DENT, President.

Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS,
Chairman Senate Committee on the District of Columbia.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 24, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to invite the attention of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia to the urgent necessity for some immediate legislation which will enable the health officer of the District to properly discharge the important duties imposed upon him by Congress.

Section 26 of an act of Congress approved February 21, 1871, entitled "An act to provide a government for the District of Columbia," created a board of health for said District, whose duty it was made "to declare what should be deemed nuisances injurious to health, and to provide for the removal thereof, to make and enforce regulations to prevent domestic animals from running at large, to prevent the sale of unwholesome food, and to perform such other duties as might be imposed upon said board by the Legislative Assembly." An act of Congress, approved June 23, 1874, made it the further duty of this board to make and enforce regulations to secure a full and complete record of vital statistics, including the registration of deaths and interment of the dead in said District.

In compliance with the provisions of these acts, the board of health framed a code of ordinances and promulgated certain regulations covering the subjects named. Under these ordinances and regulations, framed with much care, the health authorities have proceeded satisfactorily for a number of years. A few weeks since, however, the supreme court of the District of Columbia (or one of the members of that court) decided that it was not the intention of Congress to authorize the board of health to impose fines and penalties, and that the ordinances were therefore null and void.

The result of this decision has been to leave the District authorities without power to enforce the health laws and ordinances.

In the present emergency—the District threatened with an epidemic of small-pox—we have no authority to enforce the regulations to prevent the spread of infectious and contagious diseases, and no power to compel the abatement of nuisances injurious to the public health. The necessity for prompt action must therefore become apparent to all.

The code of municipal laws, as revised, and now under consideration by the District Committee of the House of Representatives, fully covers the subject of "public health"—the ordinances, regulations, &c., referred to having been incorporated therein by said committee—but as there may be delay in securing the passage of these laws, I would request that, if possible, a joint resolution legalizing the ordinances and regulations referred to be passed at once, that we may have authority of law under which to act in protecting the public health.

Trusting that the necessity for immediate action in this matter may be seen, and that such a joint resolution may be adopted as will provide for the present emergency,

I have the honor to remain, sir, yours, very respectfully,

SMITH TOWNSHEND, M. D.,
Health Officer District of Columbia.

Hon. I. G. HARRIS,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia, United States Senate.

NAVAL OBSERVATORY SITE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 891) to locate and purchase a new site for the United States Naval Observatory.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was read, being, in line 2, section 1, after the word "site," to insert "if practicable, to be upon an even degree of longitude west of Greenwich and."

Mr. MCPHERSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

EDUCATION IN ALASKA.

Mr. BLAIR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be instructed to inquire what, if any, provisions have been made for the education of youth in Alaska, and what, if any, additional measures are required for that purpose, and to report the same by bill or otherwise.

COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

Mr. GORDON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That a committee of nine be appointed to take in consideration the subject of the construction of a canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans; and that all papers, documents, and information relating to said subject be referred to said committee.

Be it further resolved, That said committee be authorized to confer and act concurrently with any similar committee of the House of Representatives; and that said committee be authorized to employ a clerk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to this resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to. How shall the committee be appointed?

Mr. GORDON. By the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask that the resolution be read again, by general consent.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to say to the Senator from Georgia that the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, I heard a member of it say a short time ago, was in some way considering this question. I ask the Senator whether he knows anything of that fact?

Mr. GORDON. No, I have not so understood. The subject has been before the Committee on Commerce of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I feel it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the number of special committees that have heretofore been formed; and I am not now speaking of this proposition particularly. Probably this Congress, including the extra session, has organized more special committees than any previous Congress has done for some time. The expense has been so great that now we are considering a deficiency bill to cover the expense of these committees. I call the attention of the Senate to that point. I know nothing of the merits of this resolution; I am not speaking to it, but I suggest to the Senator whether some standing committee could not consider the question as well as a special committee, and probably save to the country a great deal of expense in the end?

Mr. GORDON. I will only say in reply to the Senator that this question has been before the Committee on Commerce, and I am satisfied that the Committee on Commerce will not be able to consider the subject, nor will any other standing committee. It is the most important subject now before the American people. It is a subject of vast moment. Certainly if any question ever did deserve special consideration this question does, and the exigencies demand its immediate consideration. If the Senator were aware of the facts as I am, I am satisfied he would not make any opposition to the resolution.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, as the Senator from Georgia has said, this is a subject-matter which has already been referred to the Committee on Commerce, of which he is chairman. As one of the members of the Committee on Commerce, I am not aware of any action by it, unless the committee acted this morning, and its meeting this morning is the first one I have not been present at during this session or during the whole time I have been on the committee. It seems to me that the committee which has charge of this subject now ought to be consulted before it is transferred to another committee. I think that the Committee on Commerce has ample time to consider this subject.

The Senator from Georgia has said that the Committee on Commerce will not have time for its consideration. I cannot see the force of that objection for this reason: every member of the committee, however much of his time may be occupied in that committee, is not the less busy by being put on a new committee. This new committee has to be taken from the other committees of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, and this debate proceeds by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have nothing more to say except that I am opposed to the passage of the resolution until the Committee on Commerce has considered it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from West Virginia to move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Did the resolution pass?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It did.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I did not know it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider is pending.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The resolution goes over with that motion pending.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is the joint resolution (S. R. No. 49) in relation to United States Treasury notes.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire, in accordance with notice given the other day, to move to lay aside the pending business and any prior order that I may move to take up Senate bill No. 19, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think that motion necessary as no one seems inclined to proceed with the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the unfinished business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution in relation to United States Treasury notes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope, Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana will not press his motion to take up to-day the bill named by him. It is a bill of great importance in point of the amount of money to be taken from the Treasury, as well as the principle which it involves, and it requires quite an extended examination of the history of the statutes, and particularly the proceeding under them, and what Congress has been called upon to do hitherto, in order to discuss the subject upon those just considerations and merits that ought to be discussed under. I have been trying to go through with it in order to see what I thought my duty required me to do in respect of voting on the bill. I have not had time to finish that examination. If the Senator will allow the matter to go over to Monday, I shall be very glad.

Mr. McDONALD. I have no desire to unduly press this matter, although I wish to have it early considered, and on the request of the Senator from Vermont I will consent to let it stand until Monday.

THOMAS KEARNEY.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill No. 2188.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is not now required; it comes up as a matter of right, the morning hour being over, and no other matter pending.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2188) for the relief of Thomas Kearney. It is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling the accounts of Thomas Kearney, late collector for the district of Corpus Christi, in Texas, to credit and allow him $12,470.50 in gold, and $340 in silver, public money, of which he was robbed, while his life was in jeopardy, by Sergeant Connor and Private Jackson, United States soldiers, on the highway in Texas, on the 6th of May, 1870.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill passed the House of Representatives on the 23d of January, was submitted to the Senate Committee on Finance, and was reported favorably by that committee, and the report of the House committee adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. M'CLINTOCK.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 142.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of John M. McClintock. It is a direction to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to reopen and reconsider the claim of John M. McClintock for the refunding of certain taxes alleged to have been improperly and illegally assessed and collected for the amount of $3,600; and if, upon reopening and reconsidering the claim, the Commissioner shall find these taxes, or any part of them, to have been illegally or improperly assessed and collected from the claimant, it is made his duty to audit and ascertain the amount of taxes so illegally and improperly collected, deducting, however, any legal unpaid taxes which the claimant should have paid and did not, if any there shall be, under section 103 of the act of June 30, 1864, entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report, Mr. President.

Mr. BAYARD. There is a report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. KERNAN February 13, 1879:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1581) for the relief of John M. McClintock, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

John M. McClintock, of the city of Baltimore, Maryland, was engaged in the business of city and local expressage of baggage and merchandise in said city during the years 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, and 1870, and for and during these years he has been assessed and has paid to the collector of internal revenue of the United States for the third district in the State of Maryland the sum of $3,600. The said collector of internal revenue assessed and collected the above-described amount under the alleged authority of section 104 of the act of June 30, 1864, which provides as follows: "That any person, firm, company, or corporation carrying on or doing an express business shall be subject to and pay a duty of 3 per cent. on the gross amount of all the receipts of such express business."

Owing to the want of uniformity in the construction of this section of the statute among the different collectors of internal revenue—since it appeared that in a "large number of cities the officers of the revenue did not construe this law as applicable to persons engaged in local expressage merely; and that the carrying of passengers and baggage on no continuous or fixed route was not 'an express business within the intent of the statute'"—the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Hon. J. W. Douglas, on the 6th of April, 1870, instructed S. B. Dutcher, supervisor, New York, that "it is only those who do their business on regular routes that should be regarded as engaged in an express business and liable under section 104. * * * If taxes under section 104 have been assessed contrary to the above rule, * * * you will see that collection is suspended and claims for abatement prepared."

Under the above ruling of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the claimant in this case, in the form and manner prescribed by the rules of the Commissioner, filed his application for the refunding of the said amount of internal tax, but his claim was rejected by the said Commissioner of Internal Revenue without formal opinion containing the reasons for such rejection being given by that officer.

Subsequently, it appearing that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Hon. D. D. Pratt, was reopening the claims of Dodd's Express Company of the city of New York, and Parmelee's Local Express of Chicago, for the reason that these claimants had obtained a judgment of the circuit court of the United States construing the law (sec. 104) in their favor, application was made to the Commissioner, Hon. D. D. Pratt, by the claimant to have his claim reopened and the former ruling set aside, and the amount of tax, as alleged to have been erroneously or illegally collected, refunded to him; but the Commissioner of Internal Revenue decided that, inasmuch as his predecessors in office had rejected this claim, he had no authority to act in the premises as requested by claimant. The official record of the Internal Revenue Office shows that the sum of $3,600 was paid by the claimant as alleged and set forth in his said application.

In view of the facts stated, and for the reason that several similar prayers for relief have been favorably considered by Congress, your committee recommend that the bill be passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have one question decided simply for my own information and guidance; and that is, whether this is a bill affecting the finances and therefore belonging to the Finance Committee, or whether it relates to a claim against the Government, and therefore belongs to the Committee on Claims? We have a large number of cases of this kind before the Committee on Claims. We may adopt one rule, and the Finance Committee may adopt another. It is proper that the Senate should know and understand in what respect such claims as these shall be regarded. If they go to the Finance Committee I want the Committee on Claims discharged from all of them, for I do not wish to be coming in conflict with the other committees of the Senate. If this is a claim that belongs to the Committee on Claims, it ought to go there, and the Finance Committee ought not to act upon it.

I hold in my hand one of the bills laid on my table this morning. It is House bill No. 2802, for the relief of the owner of the bark Grapeshot. It is an old claim, to have a certain amount of money in the Treasury paid to the owner of this vessel. We have had such claims as that before the Committee on Claims time and again. Now, how does that go to the Finance Committee? Here it is referred to the Finance Committee, and I have found and have here upon my desk bills which I am watching and have marked, half a dozen of them, which have gone to the Committee on Finance; some of them having formerly been reported adversely by the Committee on Claims and being of a class which have always been considered claims when presented to the Committee on Claims.

We have before the Committee on Claims a bill that was formerly before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and was reported adversely by that committee; and so it is now presented to the Committee on Claims. Some of these cases have been reported adversely by the Committee on Claims, and now they are being taken to the Committee on Finance. I suppose if they shall be reported adversely there, they will be taken to some other committee.

It is a matter of utter indifference to me; the Committee on Claims has more work than it can do, and we are certainly not attempting to absorb jurisdiction; we are not wanting these cases; but the Senate ought to determine this question, and we ought to know its view and have one uniform rule, and let them all go to the same committee.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am very sure that it would be a great relief to the Committee on Finance if the Committee on Claims, of which the honorable Senator from Missouri is so able a head, should take the entire jurisdiction of cases involving claims against the United States in the construction of revenue laws by the officials. This case is one of a class. By construction of the revenue laws, the Department exacted a tax from a citizen, which the judicial branch of the Government subsequently decided was improperly exacted. This bill is to enable the accounting officers of the Treasury to conform their construction in settling the accounts of the debtor, to accord with the decision of the courts on the subject. From time immemorial I believe such cases have been passed upon by the Finance Committee.

I am sure that committee would be relieved greatly if the Committee on Claims would take all such cases from their jurisdiction; but I simply repeat that the unvarying practice has been that claims of this character growing out of a contested construction of the revenue acts of the Government shall be referred to and settled by the Committee on Finance. That is why this case, which is one of a class, followed the rule and came to that committee, was reported by it after full and thorough action, and the present bill is but a continuation of similar bills of the same class, and seeks to make the construction of the law and the decision of the Department coincide with the construction of the judicial branch in cases brought before it. A test case was made in New York to settle whether these taxes on local express companies were properly payable under the law of 1864 or not, and the court after long delay decided that the parties were exempt. The Department had prior to that time decided that they were liable. Now we simply say that the proper interpretation put upon the law by the judicial branch shall be followed in this case. It cannot therefore be considered in the nature of a private claim. It is a subject of accounting by a citizen to the Department, and having the question controlled by judicial interpretation.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have had no time to examine this bill; but in the Forty-fifth Congress, and I believe in the Forty-fourth Congress also, a bill precisely similar to this, and referring to the same class of business in Boston or in Philadelphia, was before the Committee on Claims, was considered by the committee, and reported favorably. As a matter of course, any Senator will understand that the Committee on Claims would be more than willing to be released from the business that is now before it, but the question is whether this is a claim against the Government or not, and whether it should go to the Committee on Claims.

I say that committee did have a bill like this, and the members of that committee will recollect it; it was reported by Senator Wadleigh and was passed by this body; and in that connection this very same subject was considered, and in that case relief was granted. Now, we have a number of cases before the Committee on Claims, some where parties were assessed twice and paid the second assessment and the officers of the Government refused to refund. We have a number of claims of that kind. We have a number of cases where the claimants claim that the assessment against them was illegal, and yet they were forced to pay it. Now, shall we consider them or shall we ask that the Committee on Claims be discharged and the cases sent to the Committee on Finance? I do not know what was the rule of the Senate prior to 1875, but I state a fact which the records of the Senate will show, that this class of claims since 1875 has been uniformly sent to the Committee on Claims, and that the beginning of the Forty-sixth Congress was the first time when a change was made and they were sent to the Committee on Finance, and I find a large number of them have taken that course. I have no doubt the bill is just, but it is simply a question of where these cases shall be considered.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STOREHOUSE AND DEPOT AT OMAHA.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 62) introduced by the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS,] authorizing the Secretary of War to expend a sum of money heretofore appropriated for the erection of a storehouse and depot building at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, have considered the same; and there has been referred to it also House joint resolution No. 163, for precisely the same purpose. I am instructed to report back the House joint resolution to the Senate and recommend its passage.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution. Economical considerations demand its immediate passage. As my colleague [Mr. SAUNDERS] resides at Omaha, and as he introduced a similar resolution in the Senate, I give way to him for an explanation, if one is required.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask the Senate to consider the joint resolution just reported by the Senator from Missouri.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 163) authorizing the Secretary of War to expend a sum of money heretofore appropriated for the erection of a storehouse and depot building at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, was read.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There was an appropriation made last June for the building of a storehouse for the benefit of the military headquarters at Omaha, to save the expense of sending everything needed four miles, as they now have to do, to the fort. Thirty thousand dollars was appropriated at the last session of Congress, but it was found afterward that there was a section in the Revised Statutes that required the Legislature of the State to cede its jurisdiction over the site before this money could be expended. The title is all perfected. We have the signature of the Attorney-General to that effect. Everything is in readiness. I have letters here to show that they are prepared to go on with the work, and are desirous to pursue it immediately, but they are awaiting some action of this kind which will enable the Secretary of War to expend the money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before I assent to the consideration of this measure, I should like to find out a little about it. The Constitution provides, as we all know, that the dominion of the United States over places acquired for naval dock-yards and military sites, and so on, shall be exclusive, and we have always been in the habit, I believe without exception, unless it was an accident, before we took lands in the States and built military structures upon them, of obtaining from the State a cession of the jurisdiction so that our officers and operations on that land should be under the dominion of the United States, and not under the dominion of the State. If I understand correctly the statement here, it appears that the law now requires that. We did provide the money, and it was said that the citizens of Nebraska were going to give the land; but here is an expenditure of which this $30,000, I suppose, is only the first installment, for a permanent military structure, a kind of depot or quartermaster's establishment. It appears to me rather doubtful whether it is a wise thing for the United States to proceed to expend money upon this property until we shall be able to get from the State of Nebraska the right to control it. It will be liable to taxation, I suppose; it will be liable to all the dominion that the State of Nebraska has over private property. It seems to me that the Senate ought to think a little before we take that extraordinary step.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the Senator allow me to explain?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The bill that appropriated this money provided that the land on which the depot should be built should not cost anything to the Government. The citizens of Omaha have donated five acres of valuable land for this purpose, and the title has been approved both there and by the Attorney-General here. The Attorney-General has assured the War Department that the title to the land is perfect so far as giving the fee-simple on the part of the donors is concerned; but a question is raised whether the money can be expended without something of this kind authorizing the Secretary of War to proceed. The title is perfect to the land in this Government at this time and is on record; but the State Legislature will not meet till next winter. We want to expend the money now because everything is ready. Now the Government has to haul everything four miles from Omaha to the fort, whereas this depot is on the line of the road. The money, I will state, will go back to the Treasury on the 30th of June next unless it is used, and they are all ready now, as I can show by the quartermaster's report. They have the plans and specifications all ready awaiting something of this kind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any instance known to my friend from Nebraska where the United States has proceeded to erect permanent military structures at the expense of the Government upon private property?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, sir; one at Fort Omaha. They took part of it and afterward bought forty acres of land there. Dominion was relinquished by the Legislature over the property purchased, as it will be in this case. On the other part I do not think the jurisdiction was ceded when the property was taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will be a pretty strong reason for not going any further if we have now got public buildings on private property there, which the State is unwilling to cede to us under the provisions of the Constitution or has not ceded.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Legislature has ceded it, but not at the time the property was taken. The Government did the work before, and the Legislature took action afterward, just as it will do in this case.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does the Senator from Vermont conceive it to be necessary in case of the acquisition of property for forts and arsenals that the Legislature of the State wherein the land is situated should cede jurisdiction over it in order to enable the Government to utilize it for public purposes?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not said that, Mr. President; but I say that it appeared to be thought important in the Constitution, and it has been found so by some sad experiences since, that the sovereign jurisdiction of the Government over its own forts and arsenals should be exclusive of that of the State, just as in the same way the sovereign jurisdiction of the State over its own military or civil establishments must be exclusive, and ought to be exclusive of that of the United States. My point is not that we cannot lawfully appropriate this money, if we choose to give it, to build structures upon the private property of citizens, or upon property that private citizens have conveyed by deed to the United States. We can appropriate the money for it; but then the question is, whether doing that has ousted the State of any of its original jurisdiction over that land as private property. That is the question.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I have had occasion to look into this matter a good deal. These cessions have carried with them consequences that at one time were not thought to follow. It is a very well established principle of law in this country that where the State cedes jurisdiction over any portion of her territory to the United States for any of the purposes contemplated in this part of the Constitution, the persons or inhabitants living or residing within that territory lose their political rights within the State. So I know it is in my own State. I know now of two thousand people within the jurisdiction of the United States who are held to have no political rights whatever in the State, they being within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States because the State ceded to the General Government all her authority over the Pensacola navy-yard. I thought it was a very unwise thing to do. With respect to the military reservations no such cession was ever made. The forts in my State are erected on property acquired by the Government by private purchase, but no cession of jurisdiction over them ever was made by State authority; still they are utilized for all public purposes just the same, and I have never thought it necessary to go through the form of a cession of jurisdiction to enable the Government to use property for these purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But suppose the State should choose to tax that land for illustration?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not think it could do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That raises the very question. It surely could not do it if we had a cession; but it would not be so certain it could not do it if we had not. I should very much doubt if the United States were to buy up the whole county in which I live in the State of Vermont, that the inhabitants thereof were going to escape taxation or any other duty that they owed to the State of Vermont when that purchase had been made by the United States without the consent of the State. I do not think it very safe to assume a proposition of that kind. Of course in the case of a very small purchase, very likely the State would not care to tax it; but it might be that she would; it might be that the State would wish to execute some particular process that she had against the commanding officer of the fort or arsenal, or whatever it might be, at a time when it would be very unfortunate for the United States that it should be done. The theory of the Constitution, therefore, was that there should be, in respect of dock-yards, arsenals and so on, so far as they were necessary and so far as the State chose, a political dominion of the Government whose property they were, for reasons that it is quite unnecessary to go into an extensive discussion about, because we all understand them and probably we understand them alike.

That is all my point about it. I do not say that the United States cannot acquire private property in the sense of ownership, just like any other corporation, in a State, without her consent. I rather think she can, although that is a question that might be argued with considerable force on both sides; and thus it is that I call the attention of the Senate to what appears to me the doubtful propriety (except in the case of some extreme emergency where we cannot wait) of proceeding to expend money for permanent structures upon property the dominion of which we cannot obtain or do not obtain or have not obtained from the State itself. If it be necessary to have exceptions, as in many of the State grants for particular purposes where the two dominions do not necessarily conflict, they can be put in; but in the ordinary sense I should say it was extremely unwise.

My duty is done in calling the attention of the Senate to it. I shall not object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, that the joint resolution is up for consideration, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether he has the statement or evidence that the Attorney-General has approved this title?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 29, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. W. BRUSH, D. D., Methodist Episcopal church, Austin, Texas.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Hon. Lawrence Weldon, a prominent citizen of Illinois, be admitted to the privileges of the floor for two days.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to object in this instance, but I do think that gentlemen should state the position occupied by those to whom the privileges of the floor are to be granted, in their own States, before the House grants that privilege.

I fear we are breaking away from the rule which has worked so beneficially for the comfort and convenience of the House in the progress of its business.

Mr. WHITE. I would like to inquire where we are to stop in this matter of granting the privilege of the floor.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have not asked the privilege before for any gentleman.

Mr. WHITE. Neither have I.

Mr. KENNA. We are now revising the rules and will remedy that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the privilege of the floor be extended for two days to the gentleman named. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the request was granted.

PUBLIC ROADS POST-ROUTES.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being demanded, the morning hour now begins at fifteen minutes past twelve o'clock. The unfinished business is the bill (H. R. No. 3384) declaring all public roads post-routes.

The pending question was on seconding the demand for the previous question, and the House was dividing at the expiration of the last morning hour, when the point was made that a quorum had not voted.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, that point of order was made by myself, and if there be no objection, I now withdraw it, as I do not wish to delay the House, because it is evident that a quorum is now present.

The SPEAKER. If the point of order is not insisted upon that a quorum did not vote, the previous question will be considered as seconded.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would like the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COOK] for a moment. I will not insist on the point of order if he will allow an amendment making these public roads and highways post-routes merely while the mails are carried upon them.

Mr. COOK. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. On the division yesterday on seconding the demand for the previous question the ayes were 83 and the noes 44. The point of order that a quorum did not vote is now withdrawn, and the previous question is seconded. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent to submit an amendment.

Mr. STONE. The gentleman from Illinois authorizes me to state the amendment he proposes. It is to insert, after the word "post-routes," the words "while the mails are carried thereon."

Mr. COOK. That is the language which is used in the law as applying to plank-roads, rivers, and canals.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the bill be read as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all public roads and highways are hereby declared post-routes while the mails are carried thereon; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to put postal service upon all such routes when the public necessity may require it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I must object to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois. It is a new thing and we have no chance to discuss it.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs: Shall the main question be now put?

The main question was ordered.

The question was on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out the words "and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to put postal service upon all such routes when the public necessity may require it."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CLYMER. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAWK. Let the bill be again read as amended.

The bill, as amended, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all public roads and highways are hereby declared post-routes.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 100, not voting 57; as follows:

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HARMER. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. DICK, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of New Jersey.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, is paired with Mr. PIERCE, of New York.

Mr. PAGE. My colleague from California, Mr. BERRY, is absent by leave of the House.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS SOLD FOR DIRECT TAXES.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 321) for the relief of owners and purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in insurrectionary States; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SECTION 740 OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. NEW. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously to report back favorably for present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2932) amending section 740 of the Revised Statutes, with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 740 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"When a State contains more than one district or division every suit not of a local nature, in the circuit or district courts thereof, against a single defendant, inhabitant of such State, must be brought in the district or division where he resides; but if there are two or more defendants, residing in different districts or divisions of the State, it may be brought in either district or division, and a duplicate writ may be issued against the defendants, directed to the marshal of any other district or division in which any defendant resides. The clerk issuing the duplicate writ shall indorse thereon that it is a true copy of a writ sued out of the court of the proper district or division; and such original and duplicate writs, when executed and returned into the office from which they issue, shall constitute and be proceeded on as one suit; and upon any judgment or decree rendered therein execution may be issued, directed to the marshal of the district or division of any district or division in the same State. In all cases of removal of suits from State courts to the courts of the United States, such removal shall be to the United States courts held in the district or division in which said State courts are held; and the time within which the removal shall be perfected, in so far as it refers to the terms of the United States courts, shall be deemed to refer to the terms of the United States courts held in such district or division."

The amendments reported from the Committee on the Judiciary were as follows:

In line 9, after the words "district or division," insert the words "as the case may be."

In line 25, after the words "district or division," insert the words "as the case may be."

At the end of the bill add the following:

"As aforesaid. And all cases which may be removed from the district to the circuit court, either by appeal or writ of error, may in like manner be taken from the district court of any division to the circuit court next to be held in the same division; and if no circuit court be held in such division the appeal or writ of error shall be taken to such circuit court within the State as shall be ordered by the said district."

Mr. CONGER. Is that bill reported from any committee?

The SPEAKER. It is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONGER. I hope it may go to the Committee of the Whole for consideration. It is a very important bill, and there are some provisions in it which no one can understand without further examination.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make a point of order on the bill?

Mr. CONGER. I do, if it be subject to one.

The SPEAKER. What point?

Mr. CONGER. I heard but a portion of the bill read. I would like to hear it read again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. CONGER. Upon hearing the bill read again, I perceive that it does not contain the provision which I supposed was in it. I have no objection to its consideration at this time.

The amendments reported from the committee were then agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would inquire if this is the unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. NEW. It is.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEW moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TERM OF SERVICE OF JURORS.

Mr. HERBERT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3336) to prescribe the time of service of jurors.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no person shall serve as a petit juror in any court of the United States more than three weeks during any one year: Provided, however, That jurors may sit as long as may be necessary to decide causes the trial of which may have been begun before the expiration of such term of service.

SEC. 2. Judges shall provide, according to the mode of drawing of juries now in force, for the drawing of such additional juries as may be necessary to complete the business of courts which sit more than three weeks.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect within one month after its approval.

Mr. CONGER. I raise a point of order upon that bill, that it will lead to additional expense in the drawing of new jurors, and therefore it should first be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That point of order, the Chair thinks, rests upon a very remote contingency. This bill is general in every particular; it makes no appropriation.

Mr. CONGER. No; but it makes a positive enactment that no juror shall serve over three weeks at one time, unless at the expiration of that time he may be impaneled on a case the trial of which is still going on. This law provides that the judge shall make provision for the drawing and summoning of a new venire during the session of the court.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a contingency which he is not called upon to contemplate. In order that a point of order shall lie against the bill it should be shown that it requires the appropriation of money to carry it into effect.

Mr. CONGER. There is no question that if the bill is ever enforced at all it would require additional expense.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of an argument against the bill by such members as may be opposed to it. The Chair thinks the bill should upon its face require an appropriation in order to make it liable to a point of order.

Mr. CONGER. The bill is positive that this shall be done. It seems to me that upon a moment's reflection it must be seen that it will increase expenditures. That is apparent upon the face of the bill. I can hardly imagine a case where an increased expenditure by the compulsory terms of a law can be more apparent than in this case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that in order to be subject to the point of order the bill should contain an affirmative declaration requiring an appropriation or expenditure of money. That is in accord with former decisions of the Chair, that the bill shall contain an affirmative statement that an appropriation or expenditure should be made. The Chair does not see that this bill comes within the rule.

Mr. CONGER. Then I ask that it may be sent to the Committee of the Whole for consideration.

Mr. HERBERT. I prefer that it be considered in the House at this time.

Mr. WHITE. Let the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. WHITE. I would like to inquire if this is a unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. HERBERT. I have been instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report this bill and put it upon its passage at this time. There was considerable discussion in the committee upon the bill, and at that time the members were not unanimous in its favor. I do not know whether any gentleman upon the committee intends to oppose its passage or not. If so, it is the understanding of the committee that any member of the committee has a perfect right to oppose the bill if he sees proper.

Mr. CONGER. Yes.

Mr. HERBERT. I do not know whether any member of the committee desires to oppose it or not.

Mr. WHITE. Why limit time of service of jurors to three weeks?

Mr. HERBERT. I will state. In some of the courts of the United States jurors are now compelled to stay as long as six and sometimes eight weeks at a time. That is an intolerable hardship upon any man engaged in business, whether he be a farmer, or a merchant, or whatever his business may be. It is a hardship upon such a man to take him away from home and compel him by law, without any volition of his own, to serve for $2 a day for eight consecutive weeks. At the last session of the present Congress we reduced the pay of jurors from $3 a day to $2. Business men cannot afford to serve the Government for this pay so long as six or eight weeks at a time. They are always getting excused on every possible pretext; and the courts cannot resist the excuses that are made.

In the State I have the honor to represent in part we have, and have had for years, a law similar to that proposed in this bill, except that in Alabama no person is allowed to serve as a petit juror more than one week in any one year. There is a similar law in the State of Georgia and in the State of Texas. In other States similar provisions are gradually being adopted, especially for courts which set for any length of time. In the State of Massachusetts there is a special law for the county of Suffolk, limiting the term of service of jurors to thirty days. In the State of Ohio the limitation is the same as that proposed in this bill; no person is compelled to serve more than three weeks, and I am told by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] that such is the law in his State.

It can readily be seen why such a law as this ought to be passed for the United States courts. Most of the State courts sit in every county twice a year, and the term of the court is generally not more than from one to three weeks. Consequently, as to the State courts there is no great necessity for a law of this kind, except where courts are continuously in session, as in the cities. But the United States courts throughout the Union sit sometimes for a much longer period than three weeks. This is the reason which influenced the committee to recommend the passage of the bill.

The provision of the bill is mandatory. It is that no person shall serve more than three weeks. The question was discussed in the committee, whether the provision ought not to be made permissive, whether it ought not to be left to the juror in each case to say whether he would be willing to serve longer than three weeks. The consideration which influenced us to report the bill in its present shape was this: the law now requires that jurors shall be drawn and summoned beforehand; and the judge of the court when ordering juries to be drawn cannot well foresee which of the jurors might be willing to serve more than three weeks and which of them would avail themselves of the privilege of such a law as this. Hence the judge would not know how many to summon for the fourth week, for instance, or the seventh week. To obviate any difficulty of this kind, we have provided that no person shall serve as a juror longer than three weeks, thus assimilating the law of the United States to the law in many of the States.

We have provided that when a trial of a case has begun during the three weeks for which a jury has been sitting, that jury shall sit as long as is necessary to conclude the trial of the pending cause. It is further provided in the bill, as an additional safeguard, that the law shall not take effect for one month after its approval, so as to give the courts time to adjust their machinery to the requirements of the law.

I am instructed by the committee to ask for the passage of the bill. If any gentlemen on the other side desire to oppose it, I am willing to allow a reasonable time for discussion. [Mr. CONGER rose.] How much time does the gentleman from Michigan desire?

Mr. CONGER. There has been no opportunity, of course, to discuss——

Mr. HERBERT. How much time does the gentleman ask?

Mr. CONGER. I am replying to that question.

Mr. HERBERT. I will not yield the floor to any gentleman except for a definite time. How much time does the gentleman from Michigan ask, if I yield to him?

Mr. CONGER. I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that this is a new question to the House, and I have not had time, nor have other members had——

Mr. HERBERT. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. CONGER. Is the gentleman so impatient that he cannot hear me?

Mr. HERBERT. I simply want it understood that I do not yield the floor.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman may hold the floor. I never undertake to take the floor without permission. I say that members of the House, so far as I am aware, have not had any opportunity to examine this bill and its bearings. I would like an opportunity to do so. It seems to me that the bill does not provide for contingencies which may arise and which would necessarily cause great confusion and expense. The judge would not know in advance the exact time during which his court would sit; and it might happen that in order to finish the business the term might necessarily be continued two or three days beyond the three weeks within which it was expected all the business would be concluded. Under this law, if a judge had not directed beforehand the drawing of a new jury, he might be compelled to adjourn the court, leaving the business unfinished.

Mr. HERBERT. That case would rarely happen. Almost always cases are set in courts for the first, the second, the third, or the fourth week, &c. As a general rule judges are able to say beforehand how long the court will sit.

Mr. CONGER. There is another point to which I wish to call the gentleman's attention, and which needs some investigation. If it be the fact that the change of law paying jurors but $2 a day makes the necessity for passing this proposition, then I think the Committee on the Judiciary should have inquired into the propriety of restoring the old law or changing it so as to make it equitable and just to all jurors. That seems to be the only argument now.

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir; there are other reasons besides that. I do not wish to take up time to go at length into a discussion of the bill, but I am willing to give the gentleman from Michigan on the other side, if he desires it, reasonable opportunity to oppose it. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. CONGER. I have already said I wish, as other gentlemen around me do, to examine this bill, and therefore have asked it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HERBERT. I am instructed to put the bill on its passage by the committee. I have no power to yield to the request of the gentleman from Michigan. If gentlemen are not ready to argue the question I demand the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I ask two hours for the discussion of this bill.

Mr. HERBERT. I am willing to yield to the gentleman five or ten minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot take time in that way.

Mr. HERBERT. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I understand it is in order to commit.

The SPEAKER. Not pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Yes; if the two are pending at the same time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the floor to make the motion. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. CONGER. Yes; and he has made his demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. He has.

Mr. CONGER. He cannot hold the floor while we are determining the demand.

The SPEAKER. But he has a right to have his demand determined before anybody else can get the floor for a motion to commit.

Mr. CONGER. Subsequent to the demand for the previous question does the Chair say other motions are not in order?

The SPEAKER. There are other motions in order, but the motion to commit is not one of them.

Mr. CONGER. The motion to adjourn would be in order.

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. CONGER. A motion to commit would be in order now.

The SPEAKER. It would not; but a motion to lay upon the table would be in order.

Mr. CONGER. But, under the rule, precedence is given to the motion to commit.

The SPEAKER. The rule will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged; and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to commit, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day, and at the same stage of the bill or proposition.

Mr. CONGER. I admit my mistake; I had the impression that the motion to commit preceded the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KNOTT. Before the gentleman from Alabama demands the previous question——

The SPEAKER. He has demanded it.

Mr. KNOTT. He will withdraw it for one moment.

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest, then, if the gentleman from Alabama withdraws his demand for the previous question, I have the floor.

Mr. KNOTT. No, sir; I have the floor.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman from Alabama withdraws his demand for the previous question, I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Alabama withdraws his demand for the previous question and yields the floor, that is another thing.

Mr. HERBERT. But I do not yield it.

Mr. CONGER. Then the question is on seconding——

Mr. HERBERT. I wish to say there is nothing partisan, nothing political, nothing sectional in this question at all.

Mr. CONGER. I object to debate.

Mr. HERBERT. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 29.

Mr. CONGER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER and Mr. HERBERT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 38.

Mr. CONGER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point against a quorum? The morning hour has expired, and if there is a second——

Mr. CONGER. I will make that when it comes up again.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired unless there is a second to the demand for the previous question. If there be a second that will take it out of the morning hour, and the question must be disposed of at once.

Mr. CONGER. There is no second if there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that there is no quorum.

Mr. CONGER. I do.

The SPEAKER. Then this question goes over until the next morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. And by going over it will give us an opportunity to examine the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to continue the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. TALBOTT. Will the gentleman let me introduce a joint resolution from the Legislature of the State of Maryland?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] was cut off yesterday by an objection, and if I yield at all I must yield to him.

Mr. WARNER. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky indicate what he wants done?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have risen to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the report of the Committee on Rules. I do not desire to cut off any gentleman who wishes to make any motion that will give rise to no debate.

BERLIN INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report the following joint resolution, which was referred to that committee, in relation to the international German fishery exhibition to be held at Berlin in April next. The subject is one of great importance to the whole country, and the committee unanimously recommend the speedy passage by the House of the resolution as amended by the committee. The accompanying letters from the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, Professor Baird of the Smithsonian Institution, the American minister at Berlin, and also a letter from Mr. Von Behr, a member of the German Parliament and president of the international fishery exhibition at Berlin, all of whom strongly urge the representation of the United States at the exhibition, will give full detailed information in reference to this subject:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 26, 1880.

SIR: In view, not merely of the importance of the subject of fish propagation from a national and material point of view, but also of the anxiety shown by the German government that the United States should be adequately represented at the approaching international fishery exhibition to be held at Berlin, I deem it proper to call the earnest attention of your committee to the subject, in order that by the passage of a proper act accompanied by an appropriation of a sufficient sum a successful representation of American piscicultural progress at that exhibition may be assured.

The subject was brought to the attention of Congress by means of a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, dated the 20th of January, 1879. With that letter were inclosed copies of a dispatch from the late Mr. Bayard Taylor, minister at Berlin, and a letter from Professor Spencer F. Baird, the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, showing the great advantages which would accrue from our participation in that exhibition. It does not seem necessary now, as the subject is already before Congress in another form, and its importance and urgency are believed to be generally understood, to reproduce that correspondence.

A joint resolution, introduced by Hon. Mr. DEUSTER on the 15th instant, is now before Congress for consideration. That resolution appropriates $20,000 "to enable the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries to exhibit America in Berlin in April, 1880, a fair and full collection of the different specimens of American food-fishes, casts thereof, models of, and implements, &c., used in the prosecution of American fisheries," and is now understood to be before your committee.

In view of the urgency of an appropriation being made immediately in order to be effective, I deem it not improper to call attention to the points in which Mr. DEUSTER's resolution seems to come short of the legislation needed. The resolution should provide that the Commissioner should have authority to represent the United States at the exhibition in person or by a suitable delegate, to be nominated and appointed by the Secretary of State, and that authority should be given for the transmission from Washington of articles already possessed by the Government and available for the purpose, as well as for procuring or causing to be made and exhibited the more modern apparatus and methods of the past few years. Provision should also be made for the submission to the Department of State, and through it to Congress, of a full report of the Commissioner on the exhibition, and the progress made in the practical utilization of pisciculture as shown thereat.

I am informed by the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries that it is essential that the necessary action of Congress be taken within three weeks from the 22d instant, or the proposed participation of the United States in the Berlin fish exhibition will be impossible.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. M. EVARTS.

Hon. S. S. COX,
Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 22, 1880.

DEAR PROFESSOR BAIRD: I have had a number of letters from Germany, especially from my brother-in-law, Dr. Adolph Meyer, of Kiel, relative to the fishery exhibition in that country, and expressing the anxiety of those interested there that the United States be represented. Their urgency is so great that I cannot but say to you that, in my opinion, everything should be done to bring about a full representation of what has been accomplished in this country in that respect, especially as there seems to be a good prospect of our excelling all others, and I would respectfully and warmly recommend this matter to your consideration. There seems to be more hope now that Congress will make the necessary appropriation.

Very truly yours,

C. SCHURZ.

Professor SPENCER F. BAIRD,
Smithsonian Institution.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 26, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, submitting copy of a joint resolution introduced into the House of Representatives on the 15th instant, having for its object the appropriation of $20,000, to enable the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries to exhibit in Berlin, in April, 1880, a collection of the different specimens of American food-fishes, casts, &c. In my opinion, it is very important that this Government be enabled to participate in the exhibition in question, and such measures should be adopted as shall enable the United States to make a full and fair exhibit of its food-fishes and the important interests connected therewith. An appropriation of $20,000, or so much thereof as might be necessary for the purpose indicated, would therefore meet with my hearty approval.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

Hon. P. V. DEUSTER,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1880.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your kind letter of this date, and beg leave to say in reply that I earnestly hope the joint resolution providing for the participation of the United States in the fishery exhibition in Germany will succeed. I have received a number of letters from men prominent in science, and especially in pisciculture in Germany, expressing great anxiety that the United States, of whom the most complete and instructive exhibition is expected, be represented on that interesting occasion; and I venture to express the hope that you will do all in your power to bring about so desirable a result.

Very truly yours,

C. SCHURZ.

Hon. P. V. DEUSTER,
House of Representatives.

Copy of letter to Professor Baird from Mr. Von Behr, member of the German Parliament and president of the international fishery exhibition, to open at Berlin April 20, 1880.

SCHMOLDOW, NEAR GRIEFSWALD, January 1, 1880.

DEAR SIR: There is the New Year, but where are the announcements of your exhibits for our great show? Most men would mourn and keep silent. Not I. Dum spiro spero. I can't, I won't believe that you don't send us your precious things. Would I ever have entered into the idea of exhibition without the firm hope, no, the firm conviction, that you would partake? Surely not. It was you who gave to the world the impulse for the great endeavoring of pisciculture by millions. It is you—you led us the way, and now you will remain aside. I dare permit myself to say, it is not at all like United States not to partake in such a work, which claims the right of calling itself the most unselfish, the most friendly to mankind, which we try to provide with excellent and cheap food.

Plenty of nations, far less known, far less advanced, will come and do their best, and Professor Baird, in two qualities, as president of the Commission for Fish and Fisheries and as president of the Smithsonian, with the beautiful claim of promoting knowledge, you would not send us your best. Excuse my warmness; think back of all my letters. I dare say you never read anything in that as real, true acknowledgment of your kindness to me, of your non-such position "in piscibus." No, dear sir, I shall not believe that you don't send before we are to open, on the 20th of April, our proud halls, and I am to repeat to all, all that ask, yes, he is not here. And if I am to say that, it will take me all, all poetry, all joy of this my dream, to do a little good to mankind. Once more I ask you, lay before your authorities a fresh expression of your strong desire to see the United States exhibition making its proud appearance within the precincts of our world show.

We have the wire, thank God. I dare say, United States never came too late, and if as late as first days of March, wire tells me: "We come. We need square meter;" we shall do our very best to have them built in the poor remaining weeks. The opening must be on the 20th of April. The world knows it. Oh, we shall have plenty of useful and most interesting things. The very best men in my country are busy and are most cleverly working. But without the United States? No, never. To-day week your Congress rebegins; he can't say no, to you and to old Germany.

Lord bless you and assist you.

Yours truly,

BEHR.

[No. 75.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, Berlin, January 5, 1880.

SIR: A day or two since I received a call from Baron George von Bunsen, member of the Imperial Diet, and a gentleman held in the very highest esteem throughout Germany, during which he pressed me very strongly to urge upon our Government the importance of the international fishery exposition to be held in Berlin, in April of the present year. He laid before me statements which convince me that it will be an exceedingly interesting and valuable collection, and that a body of men will be brought together whose papers and discussions will considerably increase the practical knowledge of the best means of creating, improving, and maintaining fisheries in various parts of the world.

He said to me that all interested in the subject here were anxious above all things that our own country should take part in such an exposition, and that we now rank as the first as regards progress in this department. He thought what we could send from the Smithsonian Institute especially, under charge of Professor Baird, would be highly honorable to the country and of great benefit to the world at large, while we ourselves would receive in return very valuable information.

His main wish was that an effort be made to induce Congress to take the necessary steps to send Professor Baird or other suitable person or persons, with such part of our collections as shall be judged most proper to represent us in this respect.

I called his attention to the short time remaining to us, and told him that I feared it was too late to get the required action. He said that if the action were taken by the end of February, it would be in ample time. To this I answered, that this was a very short time indeed in which to carry through a measure of this sort, but that I would lay the matter before you.

I have also the honor to inclose a letter from Mr. von Bunsen to Mr. Secretary Schurz on this subject, with his request that it be delivered to its proper address.

I should hesitate to bring to your notice a communication of this sort, were it not that Mr. von Bunsen assures me that the foreign office will shortly forward a dispatch in addition to the one already sent to the German minister at Washington, and that an effort is being made to induce the chancellor, Prince Bismarck, to interest himself earnestly in the matter.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

AND. D. WHITE.

The HON. WM. M. EVARTS,
Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that this should be acted on to-day or else it will be too late; and the Chair also learns that is the unanimous report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. And that committee respectfully asks for action to-day.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Oh, no, the Committee on Rules have been criticised enough for the time taken up in the discussion of the revision of the rules, and therefore I can yield the floor for no purpose which involves debate.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to state the reason why there should be action to-day?

Mr. BLACKBURN. That means of itself debate. If there is any necessity the Chair will state it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only state what has already been stated by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. Let the resolution be read and it will explain itself.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution concerning an international fishery exhibition to be held in Berlin, Germany, in April, 1880.

Whereas all civilized nations take part in the international fishery exhibition to be held in the city of Berlin, Germany, in April, 1880, it is deemed both right and expedient that the prominent and effective action of the United States in the line of the artificial propagation of fish and the stocking of depleted fishing-waters should be conspicuously and well exhibited on the occasion: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That to enable the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries to exhibit America in Berlin in April, 1880, a fair and full collection of the different specimens of American food-fishes, casts thereof, models of, and implements, &c., used in the prosecution of American fisheries, the sum of $20,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated in the Treasury of the United States, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose, to be immediately available on the passage of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the committee will now be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as follows:

2. That the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries be, and he is hereby, authorized to represent the United States, either in person, or by a deputy to be appointed by the President of the United States, and that at his discretion he may use any portion of the collection at present forming a part of the National Museum in making out the proposed exhibition for the United States.

3. That the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries be, and is hereby, instructed to present to Congress, through the Department of State, a report upon the Berlin exhibition, showing the recent progress and present condition of the fishery and of fish culture in foreign countries.

Mr. MORTON. I demand the previous question upon the joint resolution and amendments.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is a bill making appropriations, and must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that this bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the joint resolution and amendment will be referred to that committee, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON. I give notice, Mr. Speaker, that this will be called up next Tuesday in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

STOPPING PAPER INFLATION.

Mr. WARNER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported back, with amendments, a bill (H. R. No. 3348) to stop paper inflation and to provide for needed increase of volume of currency by free coinage of gold and silver and gold and silver certificates; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee on the subject of the interoceanic ship-canal, and other proposed communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, be, and are hereby, authorized to employ a clerk, to be paid out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, at the same rate per diem allowed the clerks of other committees of the House, and also a sergeant-at-arms, a stenographer, and interpreter, whenever the same may become necessary, to be paid out of the same fund.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let that resolution go to the Committee of Accounts.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of Accounts.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of further considering the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CONGER. Pending that motion, I desire to offer a suggestion. I ask unanimous consent that two hours, if necessary, be allowed for general debate on the pending proposition, the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I object. My reason for objecting is that I am informed that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] will withdraw the proposed rule.

Mr. CONGER. If the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia be withdrawn, of course I do not desire debate.

The motion of Mr. BLACKBURN was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The rule under consideration was the following:

RULE VIII.

1. Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented; and shall vote on each question put, unless, on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll-call and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

An amendment was pending, offered by Mr. TUCKER, as follows:

Amend Rule VIII by inserting after clause 1 the following:

2. Whenever a quorum fails to vote on any question, and objection is made for that cause, there shall be a call of the House, and the yeas and nays on the pending question shall at the same time be ordered. The Clerk shall call the roll, and each member as he answers to his name, or is brought before the House under the proceedings of the call of the House, shall vote on the pending question. If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote shall together make a majority of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted; and the pending question shall be decided as the majority of those voting shall appear.

Which Mr. HUNTON had moved to amend by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That those voting in the majority shall constitute a majority of those actually present in the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The debate that has occurred upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has sufficed to satisfy the Committee on Rules that its further consideration will involve at least the consumption of one or more days, and result probably in the defeat of the amendment. And if it should result otherwise and that amendment should be adopted, the Committee on Rules are of the opinion that it may in no small measure affect the final vote on the adoption of the series or system of rules which have been submitted for the consideration of the House. In view of these facts I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw his amendment and thereby enable us to proceed with the adoption or rejection of the report as a whole, and not delay the action of the House further. I desire to add that I make this request not because the Committee on Rules object to the admission of any amendment that may be offered by any member of the House, but simply because we take a practical view of what may be the probable result of the amendment.

Mr. TUCKER. I offered on yesterday my amendment to the report of the Committee on Rules, believing as I did not only that the provision which I had offered was in accordance with the Constitution, but that it was demanded by the Constitution; and I believe that it is in accordance with right policy that that rule should be adopted by this House. At the same time I am not so wedded to the adoption of a new rule which is contrary to the practice of this House for so many years, and in respect of which I find so many gentlemen on my own side of the House, as well as the solid phalanx on the other side of the House, in opposition to it, as to press it to a vote when it may delay the action of the House upon the whole report of the committee. I therefore, under these circumstances and on the suggestion and at the request of my friend from Kentucky who makes this report from the Committee on Rules, withdraw the amendment from the consideration of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks leave to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I believe the amendment is a good one. It has been thoroughly discussed, and I object to its being withdrawn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I submit to the Chair that the gentleman from Virginia has the right to withdraw his amendment under the existing rules of the House before an amendment is made to it or vote had upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression when he asked if there was objection to the withdrawal of the amendment, that inasmuch as an amendment had been proposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, it could not be withdrawn without the consent of the committee. The Clerk will read Rule 40, which permits the withdrawal of a proposition notwithstanding the proposal of an amendment.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

40. After a motion is stated by the Speaker or read by the Clerk, it shall be deemed to be in the possession of the House; but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is another rule which applies to the formal amendments offered in Committee of the Whole, and which prevents them being withdrawn except by unanimous consent of the committee. But the Chair is of opinion that under Rule 40, inasmuch as there has been no decision upon the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia and no amendment to it adopted by the committee, that gentleman has the right to withdraw it. The amendment is therefore withdrawn.

Mr. CONGER. There is no understanding, I believe, as suggested on a former day that we may go back to this rule again for amendments?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir.

Mr. CONGER. I understood there was some reservation as to the right to go back to amend and I did not know but it embraced this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule to which that reservation related was that in reference to the execution of a bond by the Sergeant-at-Arms, Rule IV.

Mr. CONGER. And it does not apply to this?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not apply to this.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule VIII by inserting after the word "prevented," in the second line of clause 1, the following:

And after the hour of half-past one o'clock p. m. members shall not be called from the Chamber by card or otherwise except when upon special application to the Doorkeeper he may deem it important that they be notified.

So that it will read:

RULE VIII.

1. Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented; and after the hour of half-past one o'clock p. m. members shall not be called from the Chamber by card or otherwise except when upon special application to the Doorkeeper he may deem it important that they be notified. Every member shall vote on each question put, unless, on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll-call and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I do not desire to detain the committee with any further remarks in regard to this amendment, for I submitted the other day such remarks as I had to offer. It is simply intended to prevent members being called from the Hall, except upon important matters, during the business sessions of the House after the hour of half-past one.

Without giving offense to friends I, for one, desire that when we enter upon the business sessions of this House I may be permitted to remain here in order to hear the explanations of bills which may be reported, and the remarks of gentlemen who may desire to advocate or oppose pending measures, or any other business which is being transacted by the House. I am not tenacious about this matter. I would like to see the amendment adopted; but if it be the judgment of this House that it better not be, I suppose I can stand this fusilade of the cards of callers as well as others can.

Mr. STEELE. Is this proposed amendment open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. STEELE. Then I move to amend at the proper place (I do not know exactly where that is) by inserting the words "and that every member shall vote right when he does vote." [Laughter.]

It occurs to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] contemplates the making every doorkeeper of this House a judge as to whether or not any member in the Hall shall be sent for to come out. Now, I have very great respect for these doorkeepers, but I think members of Congress have quite as much sense on that point as they have.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. STEELE. Certainly I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I am willing to accept his amendment, if he shall insist upon it, although I am not sure that it will not destroy the democratic party. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. Is that so? The gentleman from Wisconsin is one of those who cannot think upon any subject without lugging in politics. God help such men! [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I will join you in that prayer.

The question was taken by a viva voce vote on the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin; but before the result was announced,

Mr. O'NEILL said: I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] if he will not accept an amendment to come in at the proper place.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is dividing upon the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend his amendment by inserting at the proper place the words "and that members of the House be permitted to invite callers into the lobby in rear of the Speaker's chair." I must say that we are very inconveniently situated relative to seeing those who may call upon us at the doors of this Hall. There is no place where we can take a gentleman in order to be able to converse with him, so far as I have found in my experience. I do think, however, that gentlemen here sometimes introduce into the lobbies of the House those who are excluded under the strict rules of the House. But I do not object to that. If a gentleman can get his friends in where he can have an opportunity to converse with them let him do it, and I will not complain of any member or of any officer of the House for permitting it.

It strikes me, however, that it is a matter of very great inconvenience to members of this House that there is no place here where we can invite a gentleman who comes to see us, who may be hurried to get away from the city, and with whom we cannot converse unless we ask him to remain over and see us at our rooms. I make the suggestion in good faith. I doubt very much whether there is a member of this House who has not seen and experienced this great inconvenience.

Now, I want to say this: people are welcome to send their cards in to me at any time of the day, whether the proposed amendment shall prevail or not. I do not want to keep away from my constituents when they come to this Capitol for the purpose of seeing me. It is no burden to me to see any one of them at any time when I am not immediately engaged in the performance of my duties in the House. If I can I will try to see any one who may call on me, and I do not want to put it in the power of any officer of this House to prevent those who call on me from sending their cards in to me. That, certainly, is a very poor privilege of the American citizen.

I hope the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin will be voted down, and I would like him to yield to me to offer an amendment that we may have at least the privilege of asking those who may call to see us to come into the lobby in rear of the Speaker's chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will do so in a moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I do not think I can accept the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] after the remarks he has made. I for one am quite as willing as any other member can be to see any American citizen——

Mr. BURROWS. Without regard to race or color? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. But I would like to have about two hours and a half here to attend undisturbed to the transaction of public business?

Mr. O'NEILL. I have reduced my amendment to writing, and I now offer it from a sense of what I consider to be a matter of great convenience to members of this House, and for no other reason. The lobby in rear of the Speaker's chair is never filled with people. It is very rarely that a half a dozen people are there. Occasionally I see a member taking his ease there and resting in one of the chairs; that is all very right. But I think it hard when persons come here to see their Representatives upon important business that there is no place where those Representatives can take such persons. Now, there is no place so convenient as the lobby in the rear of the Speaker's chair. I propose to add to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin these words:

And that members of the House be permitted to invite callers into the lobby in rear of the Speaker's chair.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. O'NEILL, and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. Pairs shall be announced by the Clerk, after the completion of the second roll-call, from a written list furnished him by members, which list shall be published as a part of the proceedings immediately following the names of those not voting.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Committee on Rules have directed me to offer the following amendment:

In line 3 of the pending clause insert, after the word "published," the words "in the RECORD."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Does this amendment preclude the entry of the pairs in the Journal?

Mr. BLACKBURN. That was, I will say, the object of the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I do not understand whether this is to be a part of the journal entry, or is to be merely published in the RECORD.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I see the point the gentleman makes. I will state that this is the first time pairs have ever been recognized by rule at all. Their announcement has hitherto been tolerated, but no recognition has been given to them by the rules. For the sake of economy of time this clause of Rule VIII was devised, requiring that written memoranda of all pairs be furnished by members to the Clerk, to be read at the time the vote is announced, and to be published in the RECORD. But we do not think it necessary (and I doubt whether the gentleman from Michigan will upon reflection think it necessary) to encumber the Journal with the statement of pairs. The RECORD will contain that statement in full. As the gentleman knows, the Journal is only a limited record of the proceedings of Congress. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD we find the official proceedings stated in detail. This rule, with the amendment just submitted, will require that such pairs as may be announced by the Clerk in accordance with written memoranda furnished to him shall be published in the RECORD; but it does not provide that they be published in the Journal.

Mr. CONGER. If this proposed rule recognizes pairs for the first time, and if they are to be published in the RECORD, it seems to me they should be published in the Journal also, as there might possibly be mistakes in regard to these pairs and legislation might be affected by such mistakes. I submit that the Journal should have a full record of votes, and whatever is recognized by rule as properly connected with voting. Either pairs should not be recognized at all, or they should go into the Journal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Michigan that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky has been voted upon, and there is now no question before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire that the gentleman from Michigan and the Committee of the Whole shall understand the purpose of the amendment. We desire to secure perfect accuracy; and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the next morning after any vote may have been taken will enable each member to see whether the pairs have been announced correctly. This provision simply formulates in the shape of a rule a practice that has prevailed for many years. A quarter of a century ago members used to send to the Clerk written memoranda of pairs that had been formed on any question coming before the House.

The Journal is but an abbreviated synopsis of the proceedings of the House. The RECORD is the extended official statement of its work. This amendment proposes that in the RECORD there shall be published, immediately after the names of those not voting, a list of pairs which may be reduced to writing by members, furnished to the Clerk, and read from the desk.

Mr. CONGER. Let this clause be passed over with the understanding that the right is reserved to amend it hereafter by inserting the words "in the Journal and."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that an amendment would be in order after the amendment which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] has been seeking the floor to offer.

Mr. CONGER. Let the reservation be made, so that if hereafter it be thought proper to offer such an amendment it may be done.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that when leave of absence is granted no reason for such leave is ever stated on the Journal. I simply propose to protect the Journal from that cumbersome work which would be imposed if every pair announced to the House must be carried to the Journal. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it seems to me, submitted as it is to the inspection of every member of the House upon the succeeding morning, affords ample protection against any mistakes or misstatements which may possibly occur.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know that such an amendment as I have indicated would be desirable. I only ask that the right be allowed to go back and insert it if hereafter it be deemed necessary.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state further to the gentleman from Michigan that these pairs as announced will be kept in a book reserved for that purpose, in which the entries will be just as regular as in the Journal of the House. Thus there will be a test of the accuracy of the statement in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks that the right to return to this clause may be reserved for the purpose of moving an amendment providing that pairs shall be recorded in the Journal as well as in the RECORD. Is there any objection?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not understand that there is to be reserved the right to return to this provision of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just announced that the gentleman from Michigan asks the reservation of this right.

Mr. SIMONTON. I object.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not mean to object; but I would rather have these rules settled as we go along.

Mr. CONGER. All I desire is that there may be opportunity to go back and insert this amendment if it be necessary. I am not at all certain that we shall desire it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Such an amendment can be offered in the House. I simply desire to protect the Committee on Rules from the establishment of a precedent which may be troublesome hereafter.

Mr. CONGER. It is better to have leave of the House to do it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Michigan has that right in the House.

Mr. CONGER. Not if the previous question is demanded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. He has unless the previous question cuts him off. If the gentleman wishes to offer an amendment, I would rather have it now.

Mr. CONGER. It is not important enough to dwell upon at length. I think it may be desirable hereafter to offer it, and therefore I desire to reserve that right.

Mr. SIMONTON. What is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks the right to return to this clause of Rule VIII, for the purpose of moving an amendment, if we propose that the announcement of pairs shall be published as well in the Journal as in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMONTON. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question in reference to this rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the amendment which has provoked discussion between the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Michigan has been adopted and is no longer open to discussion.

Mr. ROBINSON. My question does not refer to that amendment, but is to the rule as it now stands, and it is whether the gentleman from Kentucky understands these lists which are to be furnished by the members shall be verified by the signature of the member furnishing it, or whether a piece of paper which says A is paired with B may be taken to the Clerk's desk and there left and that shall be considered a sufficient guarantee for publication in the RECORD.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The name of the member announcing pairs, of course, will be attached to the memoranda which he furnishes to the Clerk and that is all that the proposed rule intends to require.

Mr. ROBINSON. The point in debating this clause of the rule, so far as I understand it, is to save time and that we may be rid of this promiscuous announcement all over the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir, a double announcement.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that is the object not much time is saved, and I submit to the Committee of the Whole that it seems to me that it is of great consequence we should have the personal indorsement and guarantee of the member who stands in his seat and says that his colleague, Mr. A, is paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, and so on. We have that now, and the member announcing the pair also states how the members would vote on the question before the House if they were present.

Under this clause of the rule, we leave it to an entirely irresponsible statement, unsigned, handed to the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. This is all in the nature of general debate which has been expressly terminated by order of the House. It is now in order to discuss amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] has had for some minutes in the hands of the Clerk an amendment which will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rule VIII, after the word "voting," in clause second, add the following: Provided, They shall be announced but once during the same legislative day.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am very glad, Mr. Chairman, this rule has been reported by the chairman of that committee, although it dignifies and recognizes pairs between members. It will save, if followed, a great deal of time and render our work so much more acceptable. But I think the amendment which I have proposed, if adopted, will save more time, because we may have seven or eight times during a single sitting the announcement of these pairs. If this amendment be adopted the announcement is made but once, after the second roll-call, when the announcement of pairs is to be made. As the rule now stands that announcement must be repeated after the roll-call on every vote; so the clerks will be reading off a list of pairs here perhaps half a dozen times during the same sitting of the House. My amendment simply provides that this announcement of pairs shall be made but once during any legislative day. I think that amendment ought to be acceptable to both sides of the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Speaking for myself, I am disposed to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota. The object of the Committee on Rules in drafting this new rule was to economize time, which I am sure the gentleman from Massachusetts will appreciate and recognize when I remind him that in the confusion incident to taking the vote by yeas and nays it frequently occurs that the same pair is announced from this side of the House and again announced from that side of the House. The Committee on Rules thought the time would be economized by requiring this list of pairs to be furnished to the Clerk in writing, so that but one announcement of a pair would be made on any vote.

Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts desires, I am perfectly willing to insert after the word "members," in the second line, clause 2 of Rule VIII, the words "and signed."

Mr. ROBINSON. By them.

Mr. BLACKBURN. By them, if they choose; but I do not think that is necessary, because that second clause declares pairs shall be announced by the Clerk at the completion of the second roll-call from a written list furnished him by members. If that list be not signed by a member of the House, what evidence has the Clerk that it has been furnished by a member at all? It must be signed by a member to carry prima facie evidence to the Clerk that a member of the House has furnished it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me suggest a gentleman may carry to the Clerk a piece of paper signed by anybody.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What evidence would that piece of paper carry to the Clerk that it had been furnished by a member of the House?

Mr. ROBINSON. If I carry it to the Clerk myself it is the best evidence—the evidence of his own sight.

The CHAIRMAN. No such question is now before the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Having said so much on that point, I will simply say of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota that for myself I cannot see the necessity for announcing a pair between gentlemen more than once in any legislative day.

And in that connection, let me add, it is only of recent years that a list of those members not voting has been published in the RECORD at all. Prior to that time and until very recently no record was ever made except of the members voting in the affirmative and negative. Of recent years a record has been made of those not voting, but to this day no recognition of pairs has ever been made at all. I think the rule proposed by the committee requiring a written list to be furnished by members necessitates the signature of the member furnishing the list, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota that the announcement of such pairs shall be but once in any legislative day seems to me a still further complement of the offer of the committee to expedite the calling of the roll.

Mr. DUNNELL'S amendment was adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it in order to submit an amendment now?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move, then, after the word "members," in the second line of the second clause, to insert these words: "and signed by them."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no objection to that, and there is no objection I think on the part of the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. Would it require both of the members to sign the announcement of the pair? It would seem so.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The member making the report.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let the amendment be reported again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] to change his amendment so as to insert the words after the word "furnished" instead of after the word "members;" and let it read:

Pairs shall be announced by the Clerk after the completion of the second roll-call, from a written list furnished him and signed by members.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will modify my amendment in the manner suggested.

Mr. ACKLEN. I offer as an amendment to the amendment what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out these words: "from a written list furnished him by members," and insert "from written statements furnished and signed by the member presenting the pair."

Mr. CLYMER. Now let the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "by members," and insert "and signed by the member making the statement to the Clerk."

Mr. ACKLEN. I think that covers the ground; and with the permission of the committee I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. ROBINSON'S amendment, as modified, it was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the clause the following:
But no pair shall be announced unless one of the parties to the pair is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I can see no use in having a pair if in the first place the two members are on the floor. In the second place if members absent themselves without leave of the House, I do not think they should enjoy the privilege we are now to confer upon them of having their pairs announced. I think the adoption of the amendment would secure a better attendance of members so as to promote the dispatch of public business.

The question being taken on the amendment it was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I offer the amendment which I now send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the clause the following:
A list of all members absent without leave shall be inserted at the end of the Journal and read by the Clerk as a part thereof.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My object in offering this amendment is that the Clerk, on the day following the day on which the member is absent, shall have before the House a list of those who have neglected to discharge their duties upon this floor. I wish in other words to make it conspicuous in the Journal who are absent from their seats and from their posts of duty.

The amendment was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, was communicated to the House.

The message announced that the Senate agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 891) to locate and purchase a new site for the United States Naval Observatory.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, for the printing of 5,000 additional copies of the report of the Naval Observatory on the eclipse of 1879; of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Naval Observatory.

The message further announced that the Senate agreed to the resolution of the House of Representatives authorizing and directing the Public Printer to print 2,500 copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia for the use of said health officer.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of John McClintock, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 582) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Columbus, Ohio, and transferring certain counties from the northern to the southern district in said State.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 2188) for the relief of Thomas Kearney; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 163) authorizing the Secretary of War to expend a sum of money heretofore appropriated for the erection of a storehouse and depot building at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to strike out the last word, only for the purpose of making an inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky. I notice on page 4 of his report, under the title "of the members," a statement that the Committee on Rules desire to provide "that no member outside the railing inclosing the seats shall be counted." That is to define what shall be the floor; but while that is in the report, I find nowhere in the rules any such definition. I call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to what appears to be an omission.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is true that is not in the rules.

Mr. HAWLEY. And yet the report says the committee desire to provide that no member outside the railing inclosing the seats shall be counted as within the Hall.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that "the floor of the House" has never been defined in terms by any rule. But the rule to which he refers simply requires that a member, when desiring to vote, shall come within the railing that incloses the seats of members of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. But there is no such rule. Where is it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is a ruling made in the Thirty-fifth Congress at its first session, soon after the occupancy of the present Hall. I refer the gentleman to page 164 of the Manual and Digest.

Mr. HAWLEY. But that Manual and Rules are those for which are to be substituted these we are now considering.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is not the purpose of the Committee on Rules to do more than it has done. The ruling declared "that in order to be entitled to vote a member must have been upon the floor of the Hall, and not outside any of the doors leading to it."

Mr. HAWLEY. Is that the rule?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; but a ruling of the Speaker of the Thirty-fifth Congress, which upon appeal was sustained by a vote of the House. The rule to which the gentleman from Connecticut refers is simply meant to simplify and make more convenient the duty imposed upon the Speaker in the matter of a count by a rising vote. If members are permitted to vote in all the vacant places in the rear of the seats, it will be difficult to arrive at anything like an accuracy of count. This rule simply requires that upon a division each member shall come within the railing to be counted.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is exactly what I am driving at. The gentleman says "this rule;" there is no such rule. But in their report the Committee on Rules says:

The principal changes made under this head are as follows:

* * * * * * *

Second. That no member outside of the railing inclosing the seats shall be counted.

Now, that is all right enough; but it is not in these rules.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; because it is not in the power of the Committee on Rules or of the House of Representatives to refuse to any member of this House the right to vote if he be upon the floor of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then the report of the committee requires——

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, it does not require. The intention of the committee was, as far as possible, to bring members inside of the railing to give their votes upon a rising count. But the committee did not understand that it had the power, nor does it believe that the House of Representatives has the power, under the Constitution of this country, to refuse the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] the right to cast his vote, though he be outside of the railing. It is simply a suggestion by the committee. The gentleman can vote if he is anywhere upon the floor of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. What does this page 4 of the report mean, then?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Page 4 means no more and no less than what I have already stated to the gentleman from Connecticut: that in order to arrive at anything like an accuracy of count it is simply requested or suggested, there being an utter absence of power to enforce it, that upon a rising vote members shall come inside of the bar that incloses our seats here. But if the gentleman from Connecticut shall see fit to cast his vote from the remotest corner of this Hall, there is nothing within the power of the House, much less within the power of the Committee on Rules, to deprive him of his constitutional prerogative to vote.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not object to a word of that. But I do not understand why you have said that you have made a provision in the rules requiring that no member shall be counted unless within the bar of the House, when you have not made it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We have not said so.

Mr. HAWLEY. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

There being no objection, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read the following:

RULE IX.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, character, and conduct of members individually in their Representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to amend the rule just read by inserting, after the words "in their representative capacity only," the words which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And such conduct as disqualifies them from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. If a member of this House has been guilty of any conduct which disqualifies him under the laws of the United States from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government of the United States, that ought certainly to be such a question of privilege as will entitle this House to act upon it at any time. That is the object of my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will see how exceedingly unwise it would be to introduce an element of that sort into our rules, unless it shall say that the party had been convicted of the crime and sentenced to the disqualification. If the gentleman shall put it in the way he now does, any man might say: "I judge such a person ought to be disqualified, and I therefore make the point upon him." The gentleman certainly could not expect that this House will become itself the judge of whether a man had committed a crime of that sort or not, shall turn itself into a criminal court for the trial of a man on a question of that kind. If the gentleman is going to offer an amendment of that kind at all, it ought to apply to a case where a person has been convicted and sentenced by a proper court.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman knows very well that all persons are presumed to be innocent of every offense until they have been tried and convicted.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. Therefore they are not guilty of offenses which disqualify them from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit, unless they have been convicted of such offense.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the amendment of the gentleman does not say "conviction."

Mr. SPRINGER. The law presumes every man to be innocent of everything until he has been convicted.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House may not presume that.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not necessary that the rule should recite the common law on the subject. The rule simply recites the fact that the member is guilty; and there is a recognized means provided by law of determining that question.

Mr. CONGER. Let the amendment be read again.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the clause be read as it will stand if amended. There is nothing wrong in the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows the clause as proposed to be amended by Mr. SPRINGER:

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, character, and conduct of members individually in their representative capacity only; and such conduct as disqualifies them from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I concede the correctness of the criticism of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] But assuming that a member should forfeit his seat on this floor by reason of any crime he may have committed, that is fully covered by the preceding portion of the clause in which it is declared that—

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively.

If there should be unworthy members here, members who ought to be expelled because of the commission of crime, it is a question for the investigation and action of the House. It certainly affects the "dignity" of the House if any member has committed a crime against the laws of the country which would warrant his expulsion. I think, therefore, that the object of the amendment is fully covered by the language already embraced in the clause.

Mr. REAGAN. I am afraid we shall make a blunder if we adopt the amendment proposed. It seems to me subject to the criticism of the gentleman from Ohio. Its language is "guilty" of any offense; it does not say "convicted" of any offense. If we saw proper to take jurisdiction, we might have to try a criminal charge here. I think, however, that the rule as it stands goes as far as we ought to go. Even if it does not, I believe we should make a mistake by adopting the amendment in the form presented.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SPRINGER, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move to amend by striking out in line 3 of the pending clause the word "character." The clause will then provide that the second class of questions of privilege shall be those affecting the rights and conduct of members individually. I will state my object in offering this amendment. It has apparently been the purpose of the Committee on Rules to narrow the grounds of "personal explanations" in this House. The House has been again and again mortified by the proceedings attending "personal explanations" on this floor. Now it seems to me that if we omit the word "character," the language "rights and conduct of members" will embrace everything which the committee designed to include, while it will not leave open a wide door for "personal explanations" such as we have too often heard.

What is character as distinguished from conduct? Character is but the offspring or result of conduct. Every question affecting the rights or the conduct of a member affects to some extent his character. I think that if the word "character" be left in we open the door for those disreputable scenes which we have so often witnessed. A member may rise on this floor to defend himself from an attack made by a newspaper in his district, charging him with some offense committed twenty years before. He may allege that this affects his character as a Representative, because if guilty of the offense charged as having been committed twenty years ago he ought not to be here among respectable men. The amendment I have offered will narrow the ground for "personal explanations."

Mr. REAGAN. It will be seen that the word "character" is qualified by the succeeding words, "in their representative capacity."

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I say that a man's character in his representative capacity arises only from his conduct, his acts. These are the questions for investigation. His actions constitute his character. When you strike out the word "character" questions affecting a member's conduct will embrace all that properly should be included without leaving open a wide door for the introduction upon this floor of all kinds of newspaper assaults.

Mr. FINLEY. What distinction does the gentleman make between "conduct" and "character?"

Mr. FRYE. I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] is mistaken in his construction of this clause. He must take the language, "rights, character, and conduct," as qualified by the succeeding words, "in their representative capacity." The rights referred to are the rights of a member in his representative capacity only; the character referred to is the character of a member in his representative capacity only; the conduct referred to is the conduct of a member in his representative capacity only.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I want to ask my friend a question which I know he will answer frankly. He has not been in the habit of answering frankly; but I know he will do so to-day. How does a man obtain character in his representative capacity except as arising from his conduct in his representative capacity?

Mr. FRYE. There might be a very great difference. The conduct of a member in his representative capacity might refer to certain conduct on the floor of the House calling for censure. A question of privilege might be raised on that. The character of a member I will not undertake to define; but it is that reputation which he might get by charges affecting his character, perhaps in the way of purchase of votes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That would affect his conduct.

Mr. FRYE. Or corruption or anything of that kind.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That will affect his conduct. Character is the result of conduct.

Mr. HAWLEY. Confusion arises in discussing this, from the fact that the word "character" ought not to be there at all for another reason. It is not character that is meant, it is reputation. Nobody outside, by anything he can say or do, can affect my character. I make my character, but mischievous men may make me a bad reputation on a good character. It is reputation that ought to be there. If you do anything, I move to strike out "character," and insert "reputation." I would still strike them both out, but I will wait to see whether the word "character" is to go out or not.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 50.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of Rule IX:

The foregoing, and none other, shall be questions of privilege.

Mr. Chairman, my object in offering that is the same I had in offering the preceding amendment. It will be observed by next to the last rule proposed here, Rule XLIV, it is provided "the rules of parliamentary practice comprised in Jefferson's Manual shall govern the House in all cases to which they are applicable, and in which they are not inconsistent with the standing rules and orders of the House, and joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives. Now this rule does not preclude any other question which has been held to be a question of privilege from being such, but it says such questions shall be questions of privilege. Then in the last rule I have read a provision is contained that the rules of parliamentary practice comprised in Jefferson's Manual shall govern the House in all cases to which they are applicable. They are to be applicable where not inconsistent with the present rules. Now, if you turn to this book you will find almost every question has been held to be a question of privilege, and a privilege which may be exercised by personal explanation.

Take that last clause together with this rule and every question which arises will be a question to be decided by Jefferson's Manual as well as by this new rule.

Gentlemen may say that is not embraced in the new rules as one of the questions of privilege. To them I reply it has been so held in Jefferson's Manual to be a question of privilege. Unless you add the proviso I have suggested we will have all the scenes we have heretofore had since the foundation of the Government down to the present time. I hope there will be a restriction declaring that these, and only these, shall be considered questions of privilege.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to hear the amendment again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think this amendment should not be adopted. It has been held by Speaker BLAINE and by other Speakers of this House that all questions relating to the impeachment of the President of the United States or of a public officer were privileged questions. That question is not embraced here.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Ah! Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a moment? I am afraid the gentleman from Illinois, as well as the gentleman from Virginia, has failed to draw the distinction between privileged questions and questions of privilege. The Committee on Rules have sought to draw that line very sharply.

Mr. SPRINGER. Privileged questions are questions which the rules make privileged by their terms, and questions of privilege are such as are questions of privilege by the general common law of parliamentary bodies. That is the distinction. We make many questions privileged questions. For instance, the Committee on Printing may report at any time, and that is a privileged report, because our rules make it such. Questions of privilege are such as by the general common law of legislative bodies take priority over all other business. The question as to the impeachment of a public officer is one of those questions. I do draw the distinction, and this rule is intended to cover just the case I have indicated.

Mr. BAKER. I move to strike out the last word. I desire to make a suggestion. If there is any difficulty, such as anticipated by the gentleman from Virginia, we ought not to encumber these rules by the addition of an entire paragraph when a single word of four letters would accomplish the object—by inserting the word "only" between "shall" and "be" in the first line, so it will read "Questions of privilege shall only be," &c.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I accept that amendment as a modification of mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia as modified.

Mr. FRYE. I understood the gentleman from Virginia to accept the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. He did.

Mr. FRYE. Of course there is no objection to it, only the other word "only" occurring later should be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done.

Mr. BAKER. It is said the reading would be better by having the word "only" follow the word "be;" so it will read: "Questions of privilege shall be only," &c. I so modify my amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am satisfied the gentleman from Virginia in offering his amendment here does not desire to make a rule of this House conflict with the provisions and requirements of the Constitution itself.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. No, sir; you cannot do it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Of course it would be inoperative. What would the gentleman say about the question of impeachment?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The Constitution provides for that. It stands above all rules and above Congress, and therefore you need not make any rule about it. It is made a rule by the Constitution and is impliedly embraced in the rules themselves.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not caviling with the gentleman. Now, Mr. Chairman, if we adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia would we not have the ninth rule of this House directly in conflict with the provisions of the Federal Constitution, because that instrument declares this House has the sole power in the matter of impeachment? That is a question of privilege, and the very highest question known to this deliberative body. It is hedged around with constitutional provisions. If we were to add that these questions enumerated, among which the question of impeachment is not found, and none other, are to be considered questions of privilege, would it not, by proving inoperative, put this House, by the adoption of this system of rules, in the awkward position of attempting to override the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Just at that point of my friend's remarks let me ask a question. I do not presume the rule undertook to control the great constitutional questions which are provided for in that instrument, but if it did, it is provided in these rules that questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively. What is the right of the House? It is to impeach an officer. That is the highest question of privilege under the rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not mean to say, Mr. Chairman, that the adoption of any rule would or could in any way impair the constitutional prerogative of the House of Representatives. That is not my point at all. I call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that the adoption of his amendment, which seems to me to be unnecessary, would put the House in the position of at least apparent antagonism to one of the fundamental provisions of the Constitution.

The Committee on Rules did not enumerate the matter of impeachment here under questions of privilege, because it is a constitutional prerogative of this House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I still ask my friend the question——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am answering frankly. I think it would leave the power of the House unimpaired.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Is it not provided in the rules that questions of privilege shall be first those affecting the rights of the House collectively?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I answer the gentleman and say, yes. I will say it does not affect the power of the House on questions of impeachment at all, but it will at least result in an apparent effort to ignore and to deny to the House a prerogative and power which the Constitution imposes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has already been made.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no; it was on the preceding amendment. The point I desire to make is this: The same rule which says the House shall have the sole power of impeachment in this House also says that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. The question of privilege here is simply as to the priority of business, and if the power of impeachment itself rests in this House, it is still within the power of the House to say that the motion for impeachment shall not take effect until after the morning hour, or that it shall not be in order when something else is pending.

This House can provide its rules, and those rules would determine at what hour the House would consider the question of impeachment. The right to impeach does not imply the right to impeach while the Journal is being read, or the roll called, or the previous question on another question is being moved or a division on it taken. But this House may provide the rules for its own proceedings; and if you put it in the rules that that is not a privileged question, the rules will provide when the House will take it up. Therefore I think the House will vote down this proposition to limit what should be considered in all legislative bodies questions of the highest privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.]

The question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to strike out the word "character" and insert the word "reputation." "Character" is what we are; "reputation" is what people think of us, what they paint us to be.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Rule X will now be read.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to ask the Chair how that rule will be treated in being read for amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The portion relating to each committee will be considered as a distinct clause.

The Clerk proceeded to read Rule X, as follows:

RULE X.

OF COMMITTEES.

1. Unless otherwise specially ordered by the House, the Speaker shall appoint, at the commencement of each Congress, the following standing committees, namely:

On Elections, to consist of fifteen members.
On Ways and Means, to consist of thirteen members.
On Appropriations, to consist of fifteen members.
On the Judiciary, to consist of fifteen members.
On Banking and Currency, to consist of eleven members.
On Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to consist of eleven members.
On Commerce, to consist of fifteen members.
On Agriculture, to consist of fifteen members.
On Foreign Affairs, to consist of eleven members.
On Military Affairs, to consist of eleven members.

On Naval Affairs, to consist of eleven members.
On the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to consist of eleven members.
On the Public Lands, to consist of eleven members.
On Indian Affairs, to consist of eleven members.
On the Territories, to consist of eleven members.
On Railways and Canals, to consist of eleven members.
On Manufactures, to consist of eleven members.
On Mines and Mining, to consist of eleven members.
On Public Buildings and Grounds, to consist of eleven members.
On Pacific Railroads, to consist of eleven members.

Mr. HAWLEY. If not too late, I suggest that we strike out the word "specially" in the first line. If anything is ordered it is ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to going back?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not see the necessity for that change.

Mr. HAWLEY. The only necessity is to get rid of superfluous words so as to make a good job of this.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to conciliate the gentleman from Connecticut as far as possible with regard to these verbal amendments, but I do not see the necessity for this.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to going back?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

On Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, to consist of eleven members.

Mr. GIBSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In Rule X, line 24, strike out the words "Levees and," and insert after the word "river" the words "and its tributaries;" so that it will read:
On Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, to consist of eleven members.

Mr. FRYE. I suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana that the real controversy as to that will arise under the clause distributing the various duties to the several committees, and that the amendment be reserved and offered at that point. Then if the House sanctions the amendment which the gentleman from Louisiana desires, consent will be given to go back and amend the title.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the consent be given now to go back to amend the title of the committee if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the purpose of the amendment to be to change the name of the committee. That is a matter which would not come up under the other rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. It does more than that. It changes the scope of the committee by adding all the tributaries of the Mississippi River; and if, when we get to the substantive clause in the next rule, the view of the gentleman from Louisiana prevails, the suggestion is that his right to go back be now reserved.

Mr. GIBSON. On that understanding I am willing to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this clause with the pending amendment will be passed with the privilege of returning to it hereafter.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CHALMERS. With reference to the same committee I offer the following amendment:

Rule X, line 25, strike out "eleven" and insert "thirteen;" so that it will read:
To consist of thirteen members.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let that also be passed over.

Mr. BLACKBURN. These two amendments are simply passed over for consideration under Rule XI.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands they are passed over with the agreement that if the committee in considering Rule XI should determine to enlarge the scope of this committee so as to make it conform to the name proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana, it may return to Rule X and consider those two amendments.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report and read as follows:

On Education and Labor, to consist of eleven members.
On the Militia, to consist of eleven members.
On Patents, to consist of eleven members.
On Invalid Pensions, to consist of eleven members.

Mr. COFFROTH. I offer the following amendment to the clause last read:

Strike out "eleven" and insert "fifteen;" so it will read:
On Invalid Pensions, to consist of fifteen members.

Mr. GARFIELD. If they have three clerks I think they ought to have fifteen members.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BROWNE. I hope that amendment will prevail.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the proposed rule and read as follows:

On Pensions, to consist of eleven members.
On Claims, to consist of eleven members.

Mr. BRIGHT. I offer the following amendment to the clause last read:

Strike out "eleven" and insert "fifteen;" so that it will read:
On claims, to consist of fifteen members.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know that the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee of Claims are both overworked committees. I have no authority to speak for the Committee on Rules; but, speaking only for myself, I beg to say there is no objection to this amendment on my part.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On War Claims, to consist of eleven members.
On Private Land Claims, to consist of eleven members.
On the District of Columbia, to consist of eleven members.
On Revision of the Laws, to consist of eleven members.
On Expenditures in the State Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Treasury Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the War Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Navy Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Interior Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures on Public Buildings, to consist of seven members.
On Rules, to consist of five members.
On Accounts, to consist of seven members.
On Mileage, to consist of five members.
Also the following joint standing committees, namely:
On the Library, to consist of three members.
On Printing, to consist of three members.
On Enrolled Bills, to consist of seven members.

2. He shall also appoint all select committees which shall be ordered by the House from time to time.

3. The first-named member of each committee shall be the chairman, and, in his absence, or being excused by the House, the next-named member, and so on, as often as the case shall happen, unless the committee by a majority of their number elect a chairman.

Mr. FRYE. After the word "chairman," occurring in the second line of clause 3, there should be a semicolon instead of a comma.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that I have an amendment which covers the point he is now making. I assure the gentleman the punctuation has been carefully attended to.

Mr. FRYE. In this case the punctuation would make a very great difference to the meaning.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It would. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert a semicolon after "chairman," in line 2, and strike out the comma after the word "and" in the same line.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That leaves the rule precisely as it stands to-day.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to amend, in the fourth line of clause 3, by striking out the word "their" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "its;" also, by striking out the word "elect" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "elects."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Let us see about that a moment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not think that is right. A committee always speaks in the plural, and I do not think we ought to change the order and custom of years. A committee is not "it." My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] would reduce it to the neuter gender and the singular number.

Mr. BURROWS. You say "would reduce it." [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee.

Mr. BAYNE. I offer this amendment in no spirit of criticism. I disclaim any spirit of criticism, because I know that long custom has sanctioned the use of the plural adjective pronoun "their" in such a case as this instead of the neuter pronoun "it."

Nevertheless, I think the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is somewhat mistaken in saying that the word "committee," a collective noun, denotes the plural any more than the word "House" denotes plurality. The fact is that the unity which indicates and defines a collective noun, which is to be followed by a singular verb, is applicable to any body of persons which acts in a collective capacity as a committee acts. The words which are applied to designate a committee are always of the singular character, as "that committee," "this committee," "one committee." We use the plural when we say "two committees," "these committees," "those committees," and we indicate the plurality of existence by using the proper words to denote plurality.

Now, if you will examine this clause you will see the absurdity of using the word "their" as applied to a committee. For instance, we say this House resolves itself into a Committee of the Whole House. Now what are the constituents of this House as a Committee of the Whole different from the House as a House of Representatives? There is not a particle of material difference. The only difference that I can imagine is the fact that the Sergeant-at-Arms takes down the American eagle, and the Speaker gives place to a chairman. All the elements that constitute this House are precisely the same as those that constitute a Committee of the Whole; yet the word "House," denoting this body, in the Constitution and in the rules under consideration, is used as a collective noun in the singular number.

So far as my observation extends collective nouns have been coming one by one into the category in which I would place this one. It is according to all the analogies. It is the survival of the fittest that is taking place. It manifests itself in the spirit of generalization which is accomplishing so much in these days. And I say that the word "their," as it is, stands out in these rules as a patent solecism.

The proper word to be used in that connection is the word "it," a word denoting unity. Suppose that a committee consists of but one person, as it may very well do. Would you apply the term "their" to that committee? How will you distinguish the fact that a committee consists of more than one person? What would enable us to ascertain that fact? We cannot ascertain it from the word "committee" itself, but we must refer to something else, some extraneous sources of information, to indicate to us that the committee consists of more than one person.

Now, take the word "corporation," or the word "court," or the word "House," or the word "assembly;" take any word indicating a body that acts in a collective capacity, and the singular pronominal should be used instead of the plural. I hope, for the sake of keeping our very excellent rules in the best grammatical shape, that my amendment will prevail. It certainly is a correct one.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment—to strike out the words "by a majority of their number;" so that it will read:

The first-named member of each committee shall be the chairman, and, in his absence, or being excused by the House, the next-named member, and so on, as often as the case shall happen, unless the committee elect a chairman.

Of course they cannot elect a chairman except by a majority.

Mr. FRYE. Yes, they can.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Allow me to call the attention of the gentleman to the effect of his amendment. A quorum of a committee might meet, and, under his amendment, a majority of that quorum, but a minority of the committee, might displace the chairman named by the Speaker and elect one in his stead.

Mr. BAKER. I would inquire how it happens that after an amendment is offered to the fourth clause and a speech made on it we can get back to the third clause?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is now engaged in considering the third clause.

Mr. WARNER. Leave in the words "by a majority."

Mr. BURROWS. I will modify my amendment by adopting the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] so that it will read, "unless the committee by a majority elect a chairman."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. BRIGHAM. In justification of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I would call attention to the language employed in the second clause of Rule 23, on page 38:

Whenever a Committee of the Whole House finds itself without a quorum.

If the singular pronoun is proper in this case, it is equally proper in the case now before the committee. If some of the criticisms which have been made here are correct, the clause I have just read should read:

Whenever a Committee of the Whole House find themselves without a quorum.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BAYNE, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 35, noes 49.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. The chairman shall appoint the clerk of his committee, subject to their approval, who shall be paid at the public expense, the House having first provided therefor.

RULE XI.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF COMMITTEES.

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely: Subjects relating—

1. To the election of members: to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend by striking out in the clause last read the word "election" and inserting "elections, returns, and qualifications;" so as to read:

To the elections, returns, and qualifications of members: to the Committee on Elections.

The amendment simply uses the language employed in the Constitution of the United States. I presume there can be no objection to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not insist on this amendment. Everybody knows that the single word "elections" covers the whole case. If the gentleman puts on the additional words proposed by his amendment, he would also have to add the words "and Delegates," thus making an unnecessarily long and cumbrous title. The present title is not misunderstood by anybody. I hope we shall let it remain as it is. We do not want to have painted on the door of a committee-room a long title when a short one will do just as well. So also in the heading of our letter-paper a short title is better. It is really an economy of wind to say elections simply, instead of saying all that the gentleman proposes.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman might have economized himself very much in that respect if he had understood this amendment before making his speech. The amendment does not refer to the name of the committee, but to the subjects referred to it. It proposes to make the clause read:

To the elections, returns, and qualifications of members: to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. GARFIELD. Qualifications and returns are included in the word "elections."

Mr. SPRINGER. Our fathers when they made the Constitution did not so understand, because they used exactly the terms embraced in my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, our fathers made our rules; and we have lived under them nearly a hundred years and have found them comprehensive enough to cover every case. I confess that I thought at first that the amendment referred to the title of the committee, still I do not consider it at all necessary.

Mr. SPRINGER. The amendment simply uses the terms used in the Constitution of the United States—"elections, returns, and qualifications of members." It seems to me there can be no objection to it.

Mr. KEIFER. I think it is quite objectionable. If the gentleman himself will examine the matter carefully, I think he will see great inappropriateness in adding these words. The Committee on Elections is not a committee to consider returns, but to consider elections. It would be a very great piece of folly, I think, to say that we had a committee on returns and elections.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the language of the Constitution.

Mr. KEIFER. The Constitution of the United States does use the words which the gentleman proposes to insert here; but it uses them with reference to the power of the Senate and the House of Representatives in the determination of these questions. We want a Committee on Elections simply. The common acceptation of the words "Committee on Elections" has been so well understood that it is entirely unnecessary, and I think the gentleman on reflection will see it would be a little ridiculous, to add the words proposed by his amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. It would be no more ridiculous than the Constitution of the United States is ridiculous.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, yes; a good deal more.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Constitution, in section 5, declares that—

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Now, if the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] and his colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] had been members of the constitutional convention they would have suggested to the framers, "That is a little ridiculous."

Mr. KEIFER. Not at all, because the clause refers to the power of each House.

Mr. SPRINGER. They would have said, "You need not put in those terms at all. The House of Representatives has nothing to do with the returns of members." I say that the term "elections" does not necessarily cover all the subjects mentioned in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the Committee of Elections has nothing in the world to do with the returns and qualifications of members, unless there is a contest about an election? All members about whose seats there is no contest hand their returns to the Speaker or the Clerk; their certificates are read at the desk; they are sworn in; and that is the end of it. When there is a contest about any member's election, that case goes to the Committee of Elections, and then the returns are sent to that committee. The House is the judge of the whole thing. The Committee on Elections we may have appointed takes into consideration only the cases of contest.

Mr. SPRINGER. The rule, as just read, provides that—

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely: Subjects relating.

Now, subjects relating to the elections, returns, and qualifications of members are referred to this Committee on Elections.

Mr. REED. Well, are not returns and qualifications subjects relating to the election of members?

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course they are.

Mr. REED. What, then, is the need of having more words about it? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not hear what the gentleman from Maine said. I am surprised the gentleman uses so many words. I am afraid this Committee on Elections is supposed to have some fearful purpose by the minority of this House in offering this amendment, and I will therefore withdraw it to relieve them of their fears.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. To the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States: to the Committee on Ways and Means;

3. To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government: to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WHITE. I offer the following to come in at the end of the clause last read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the general appropriation bills shall embrace nothing but appropriations for the ordinary expenses of the different Departments of the Government and interest on the public debt. All other appropriations shall be made by bills containing only items of appropriations relating to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, a careful reading or careful attention to this amendment makes its meaning obvious. The value of a rule of that kind in the last two years of this Congress can possibly hardly be estimated. It is hardly necessary for me, in view of the history which has recently been enacted here in reference to appropriation bills, to refer in detail to the great advantages of a rule of this kind in this body. We learn by experience that many of the States of this country have yielded to the demand in this respect and have saved their Legislatures from scandal and preserved economy in administration by adopting a constitutional amendment to this effect. The great State of Pennsylvania for years was subject to obloquy, scandal, criticism, by reason of the charges of log-rolling and of incorporation of special legislation in appropriation bills. At the late constitutional convention it adopted the excellent constitutional amendment which is substantially the rule just read in your hearing.

And I will add that the Secretary of the Treasury in his last report calls attention to this subject. I hold that report in my hand, and I find there a practical suggestion from him in this respect. With a view to promote economy he ventures to suggest for the consideration of the respective Houses a permanent organization of an appropriation committee for each House which shall have leave to sit during the recess, with power to send for persons and papers, to examine expenditures, &c.

He asks also that a rule be adopted by the respective Houses limiting appropriation bills to items of appropriation and excluding legislative provisions. This must be in accord with the judgment of every experienced legislator upon this floor, and certainly is in accord with the common sense and patriotism of the country.

I thought this was the right place to put it in, because it specifically and in comprehensive language defines what shall be the duty of the Appropriation Committee. While this does not infringe upon their judicial character, upon their discretionary character, yet it excludes from their jurisdiction everything except the taking up and the manipulation of the public revenues for the support of the different departments of the Government. I think this is the right place to put it in. While I should like to see it a constitutional provision, no doubt it will be a great check and protection to this Congress by making it a part of the rules of this House.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Let the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I should prefer to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE,] offer his amendment to the third section of Rule XXI as proposed by the Committee on Rules. If, however, he insists upon inserting it here, I will now say what I desire on this subject. If he will turn to the third clause of Rule XXI as recommended by the committee, he will find the following:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the Speaker to let me interrupt him to suggest it is manifest this debate ought to be on the clause to which he has referred. I hope his colleague will withdraw for the present the pending amendment and reintroduce it at the proper place. If we start in there, it will mar the harmony of the rule.

Mr. WHITE. I only do this because the committee had already established a precedent by adding the word in brackets in the seventh clause. Of course I will defer to the sense of the House and the suggestion of my colleague.

Mr. GARFIELD. It will save time.

Mr. WHITE. Let it be considered as pending.

Mr. FRYE. Not in that form.

Mr. WHITE. Then I withdraw it, with the right to introduce it hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to offer the amendment when that Rule XXI is being considered.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to clause 3, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend clause 3 by adding the words: "And the several appropriation bills when reported to the House by the committees in which they originate shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, to be reported back to the House after due consideration, with such recommendations as the general expenditures of the Government require them to make, and the committee in which the bill originated shall thereupon have charge of it and upon its passage."

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. This amendment, Mr. Chairman, does not propose any radical innovation upon these rules as reported by the committee. If gentlemen will observe the report of the committee, it will be found that clause 7 of this same rule introduces a principle which I desire to apply to several appropriation bills, a principle which has been introduced and sustained by the Committee on Rules in reference to the Committee on Commerce, and I desire to refer to words found on page 10 of this report. The Committee on Rules in justifying their proposition that the Committee on Commerce shall report the river and harbor appropriation bill to the House for reference to the Committee on Appropriations, refers specifically to a practice in the Fortieth Congress, when the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, by a distinct agreement, allowed the Committee on Commerce to mature a bill and report it to the House to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and it was by that committee reported back to the House, with such recommendations as in their judgment the general expenditures of the Government required.

In addition to that indorsement which the Committee on Rules, intelligent, discreet, and careful as they have been—in addition to that indorsement, we have in the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] a very marked and cordial indorsement of a proposition almost identical in language with the one I now propose, in the assertion by him that during the four years of his chairmanship of that important committee that practice was carefully observed by that committee in its treatment of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: I have not risen in any spirit of criticism or cavil. I have proposed no other amendment to these rules, but I do propose this, after mature deliberation, as being in the interest of economy, efficiency, and expedition in framing appropriation bills. I will say that if this practice has been discreetly and judiciously observed in connection with the Committee on Commerce, I see no reason why it should not be observed in reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and other committees.

It has been said that the Committee on Commerce legislates; that it prepares its bills and reports them to the House for improvements not previously authorized by law; and hence it is a committee which should have exceptional privileges. Now, I undertake to say that every committee in this House has the same right per se to legislate and appropriate. It is legislating by the Appropriation Committee for the several Departments to increase or diminish their force of employés, and to increase or diminish their pay. The Committee on Appropriations not only legislates for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but it frequently tears up all the work we have done in our estimates for a public building. We perhaps limit its cost to $500,000. The Committee on Appropriations perhaps adds a million or a million and a half, or possibly three millions, to the work of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WHITE. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's five minutes have expired.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, with the view of yielding my time to my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. This can only be done by unanimous consent. Objection was made.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker). Mr. Chairman, I desire to enter my dissent to the views suggested by the majority of the committee in their report, that it logically follows because this House may be of the opinion that certain functions shall be given to the Committee on Commerce, therefore the duties of the Committee on Appropriations should be scattered among the various other committees which have been designated. It is due to myself to say that.

Mr. GARFIELD. And I agree with you.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker). It is a very different question. In regard to the scattering of the service of this committee among the various other committees of the House I have very decided views.

I believe that whichever party may be in the ascendant in this House the party discipline and the party judgment as to economic expenditures of the public money will lead in the direction of having a single head to control.

The fact is that the committees to which the gentleman desires to have referred these appropriation bills make all the laws which bind the Appropriations Committee as to the expenditures. The Committee on Commerce, as I said once before when I was upon the floor, are a law unto themselves. The authorization of the appropriations in the river and harbor bill is the only law which looks to the completion of the work provided for in the appropriation; whereas the Committee on Appropriations simply on estimates furnished and from the laws on the statute-book make the appropriations with the exception allowed under the third clause of the twenty-first proposed rule. That is the only exception, and, therefore, it is a mistake to suppose that the Committee on Appropriations can do what it has been charged with doing; it can only make law except in the direction of retrenchment.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I move to strike out the last word.

I desire to reply to the remark of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, Speaker of the House, and a member of the Committee on Rules, and to say that the Committee on Appropriations does legislate. When the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, after having exhaustively considered the needs of the public service, having considered the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, having called for specific information from the locality, have determined on what they consider a suitable appropriation in the aggregate for a public building in a certain city, the Committee on Appropriations, as a matter of fact, has overridden, and does override, the legislation on that subject, and has continued the appropriations double, treble, and, perhaps, quadruple the limit originally fixed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and approved by Congress.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that if it be right and proper for the committee on which I serve to have the jurisdiction of limiting appropriations originally, it is nothing but right and proper that that committee should have something to do and say with an estimate which extends the appropriation beyond the limitation fixed by law. And I say again, when the Committee on Appropriations reports a bill establishing clerical force in the departments, and extending or reducing the salaries of employés, it does legislate to that extent.

I can refer, in the official report of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, to a number of buildings in this country on which the expenditures have been largely beyond the limitation of law as now upon the statute-book, until we have absolutely no law for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, save and except the will of the Appropriations Committee. I can point you to an illustrious example of that in the city of New York, where there was a large appropriation in 1874 for completion, specifically including machinery, furniture, fixtures, &c. In March, 1875, the Appropriations Committee, without consulting the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, appropriated nearly $400,000 for completion, &c.; in July, 1876, $250,000 for completion, and, one month later, nearly a quarter of a million more for deficiency.

This was done under the present system of one economical head for all appropriations, and it is just possible that the grand aggregate expenditures in those years were less than in the year previous by a wholesale lopping off of appropriations imperatively demanded in other sections of the country or in other branches of the public service, the growing necessities of which could not be brought home to the minds of the Appropriations Committee in the time allotted. These large expenditures have been made in the city of New York and other large cities of the country by the Committee on Appropriations, I do not say unwisely, I do not say they did what they should not have done, but I do say that the conclusion in my mind is irresistible that had the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds been required by the rules to report such appropriations, and the Committee on Appropriations had been directed by the House to report the relative merit and amount of other appropriations carefully matured by other committees, the resulting action of the House in Committee of the Whole must have been in the interest of equality and economy of expenditure.

I say the same principle applies to the Army. If the Committee on Military Affairs decides that the estimates of the Secretary of War for the support of the Army on account of recent reorganization or otherwise are largely in excess of what is required for that purpose, why should the Committee on Appropriations make a report in excess of the real wants of the Army, based on the estimates simply, without consulting the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If my time is extended I would be happy to hear the gentleman's question and to answer it.

Mr. BLOUNT. If what the gentleman says is true, which I do not admit, and if the Committee on Appropriations exceed the limit fixed by law for the completion of public buildings, is it not competent for that gentleman or any member of his committee to have that struck out on a point of order?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have a great many privileges on this floor, but they are not of much value in the absence of intelligent preinvestigation when the Committee on Appropriations at the heel of a session bring in half a dozen bills which we dare not consider and amend lest we defeat the bills.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) This is a new character of complaint. By inference, at least, the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to charge the Committee on Appropriations with extravagance. We have generally heard in this House the committee attacked because of their economical views.

As regards the particular matter to which the gentleman has alluded: the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds always provide by law for the erection of public buildings, and they usually make a limitation as to the amount of cost; then the Committee on Appropriations say each year how much money shall be appropriated for that purpose during that year. As has been stated by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] the Committee on Appropriations cannot increase the amount and thus change the original law relating thereto except by unanimous consent of the House, for a single objection would prevent such action being taken on an appropriation bill. If therefore the cost of a public building is to be increased the proposition must originate with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CONGER. Or by amendment of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I am speaking of legislation in this House. Of course I cannot speak of what they do in the Senate. I would transgress the rules if I did.

My wish is to show to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] who submits this amendment and makes this complaint in reference to the Committee on Appropriations that there is no valid ground for his statement in that particular.

Mr. WHITE. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is already pending, and debate has been exhausted upon it.

Mr. WHITE. I do not wish to debate; I want to understand the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] moved an amendment upon which debate was exhausted. Thereupon he moved to strike out the last word of his own amendment, and debate upon that has been exhausted.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Objection was made by several members.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the pro forma amendment cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. WHITE. I only want to understand if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] by his amendment, which is a comprehensive one, means that the different committees of this House, the Committee on Commerce, the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, &c., are to originate the appropriation bills for the several departments to which their respective committees relate, report them to this House, and then have them immediately taken charge of by the Committee on Appropriations for such action as that committee may see fit. Is that the proposition before this House?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word, to the withdrawal of which objection has been made.

The pro forma amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MULDROW. I desire to offer a substitute for the third clause of the pending rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute will be read, after which the Chair will determine whether it is in order or not.

The proposed substitute was read, as follows:

To appropriations for expenditures of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, for the consular and diplomatic service, the sundry civil service, and general deficiencies, to the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is in order.

Mr. MULDROW. I desire to state that, if that amendment shall be adopted, it will be followed by proper amendments which will give to the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the Committee on Commerce, the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the Committee on Patents, the Committee on Agriculture, and also the Committee on Mississippi Levees the preparation of appropriation bills for their respective departments, and also the control and advocacy of the different appropriation bills to be brought before the House by those committees.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped, after three weeks had been consumed in discussing the report submitted by the Committee on Rules, and not one hour of that three weeks devoted to anything except the wrangle between the several committees of this House for power, that when we came to consider this report under the operation of the five-minute rule we might have been relieved from a continuation of that discussion.

I take it that anything that any gentleman can now say as to the merits of the proposition to leave the power of the Committee on Appropriations in the hands of that committee, or to divide it among the several committees of this House, will not have the slightest effect or the least influence upon the vote of any member upon this floor.

I do not stand here as the advocate or champion of the Committee on Appropriations. It is by accident alone that I am the only member of that committee who happens to be a member of the Committee on Rules. I do not care for, nor have I aught of concern in, the decision of the issue. But I had hoped that gentlemen would not have been premature in pressing their amendments to this third clause of Rule XI, instead of waiting to present them, where they naturally belong, as the clauses relating to these different committees shall be reached in their order.

I have but this to say: I have grave doubts in my mind whether the best interests of the country would be subserved or not by keeping the general appropriation legislation of Congress in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. I very much fear, however, that if you divide the duties of that committee and give to each of the committees indicated by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] absolute and unrestricted charge and custody of the respective appropriation bills, we will find our budget very much swollen. However, with that I am not concerned. I do not care whether the power of the Committee on Appropriations be left intact or not. I do not care whether these different committees be given the absolute custody and control of these respective appropriation bills or not.

But this I do mean to say: the Committee on Appropriations is not liable to the criticisms which have been pronounced upon it. It is the only committee of this House that at the conclusion of each session of Congress finds its table cleared of work, and all the service done which has been imposed upon it by the House. I call upon the chairman of any one of the committees of the Forty-fifth Congress to which it is now proposed to send these general appropriation bills, to rise in his place and say, if he can, that when that Congress ended its session the work sent to that committee by order of this House had been completed and its labors finished. The Committee on Appropriations stands alone, of all the committees of this House which ever has any work to do, in completing and finishing that work at each and every session of Congress.

But I will say this: however it may be, if it shall prove to be the pleasure of this House to divide this work, and to distribute these several appropriation bills to the different committees named, then this must address itself to the consideration of this House, to be determined as a question of prudence in legislation: whether it had not better put some limitation, some revisory power, some drag to be applied somewhere, in order to check the natural and inevitable tendency to extravagance and exorbitant disbursements of the public money.

It will not do for gentlemen to tell us, as my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] told us the other day, that it would never be permitted for one committee of this House to be made simply the clerk or amanuensis for another. If that objection be valid, if there be ground or warrant for its presentation, then the House of Representatives is nothing but a clerk to the Senate. While holding absolute power to originate all bills for raising revenue, and by practice holding absolute power in the matter of bills of general appropriation, we are by parity of reason nothing but a clerk to the Senate, to whom we submit our bills after we have drafted them, for revision or amendment.

Mr. MULDROW. I move to amend by striking out the last word of the substitute.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it permissible for a gentleman to move to strike out the last word of an amendment or a substitute which he himself has offered, in order to prolong the debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course he can move to do so; but it is simply a modification of his own amendment, which he has a right to make; and it is not debatable.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then, as the time has been fairly divided, I must object to debate by the gentleman on that modification.

Mr. MONEY. I move to amend by striking out the last word of the substitute of my colleague.

I do not see that the Committee on Appropriations can especially plume itself upon completing its work and presenting it to the House. The fact is that this Committee is a privileged committee. It keeps this House waiting here two or three months until its bills are prepared. It can report those bills whenever it sees fit; and it can take from this floor any other committee holding the floor even by a special assignment. It has all power to withhold action in this House upon its bills or to hurry action upon them, and to set aside a special or a general order that may have been made in favor of any other committee or any other public business in order that the work of the Committee on Appropriations may take precedence. Is it, then, any credit to this committee, either to its intelligence, its public spirit, its industry, or its enterprise, that it is enabled to perform its work when every other committee, however important its business, is compelled to defer to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. KENNA. Will the gentleman allow me to put a question?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENNA. If the bills of which the Committee on Appropriations now has jurisdiction were distributed to the committees named in the proposed amendments, would not the committee in charge of each particular bill enjoy the same privilege and power to put off other measures that the Committee on Appropriations now enjoys? Would there be any difference in the result?

Mr. MONEY. That is not the question I was discussing. I was meeting the claim made by the Committee on Appropriations, through its member who has charge of the report of the Committee on Rules, that the Committee on Appropriations is the only committee of the House that ever finishes its business. I made a conclusive answer.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What was the gentleman's answer?

Mr. MONEY. My answer was that the Committee on Appropriations has the privilege of introducing its work at any time, and to take from the floor of the House any other committee, however important its work, though it may hold the floor by the special or general order of the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yet my question still remains unanswered.

Mr. MONEY. What is the question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi say, as chairman of one of these committees claiming additional powers, that in the Forty-fifth Congress that committee cleared its table and discharged the work sent to it to do?

Mr. MONEY. If the work of any committee has not been done, it is, as I have stated two or three times, because the floor has been constantly occupied by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, I heartily indorse the substitute of my colleague. It is no disparagement to the Committee on Appropriations, to their high character, their zeal for the public service, their industry, their intelligence, to say that they are not as competent to report to this House bills on any particular subject as the committee to whose special charge that subject has been given.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I never intimated they were.

Mr. MONEY. The gentleman's modesty, perhaps, forbade such an intimation. I say that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, over which I have the honor to preside, is more competent (not by reason of the individual character of any of its members, but by reason of the fact that they are charged solely with the conduct of affairs relating to the Post-Office) to report a bill which shall meet the necessities of the postal service of the whole country than the Committee on Appropriations. I speak of this only as one instance among many. Any of the committees to which the amendment of my colleague proposes to refer particular subjects of appropriation is more competent to prepare appropriation bills on its particular subject of examination than any other committee, I care not what its character or ability. To assume that the Committee on Appropriations, having charge of appropriations for all the various Departments of the Government, is more competent to transact the business for each Department, has more intelligence, more accurate and minute information, higher zeal for the public service than other committees of the House, is a disparagement not only to the intelligence but to the public spirit of other committees. For this reason I heartily support the substitute offered by my colleague.

Mr. MULDROW. Mr. Chairman, the question involved in this substitute offered to the third clause is one of principle and also one of power. In the first place, in my judgment, the principle is that the labors of this House should be distributed among the several committees of the House. The responsibilities of the House should be distributed, the work of the House should be distributed as far as possible, by the Speaker to the several committees, under the direction of the rules of the House.

In the next place, it is one of power. This House should have recognized the fact, it seems to me, that no one committee should be clothed with more power than is found necessary to encompass the public interest. I make no complaint against the action of the Committee on Appropriations. They have done well, we all confess, but still that is no argument that these other committees, to whom this work is assigned, may not also do well. If then, these other committees, which have special charge of these special matters, have, as I conceive they have, the power to understand more thoroughly the various matters of appropriation which come before them, it is proper that they should have charge of reporting those bills to the House and urging the reasons why the appropriations should be made.

Again, sir, it does seem to me that our experience in this House has shown that the former system has been a great drawback upon a majority of the members on this floor, for the reason that in reference to many matters in which they are interested they have not had the opportunity to present them to the House, because the floor has been constantly occupied by the members of the Committee on Appropriations. It is no fault of theirs, but it is the fault of the rules of the House that that work has been assigned to them which ought to have been assigned to other committees, where it could be as well attended to, and in my judgment better attended to, because those other committees are conversant with more facts than are in possession of the Committee on Appropriations. I therefore object to the motion of my friend from Mississippi to strike out any words from the substitute which I have offered. I trust he will withdraw it, and that we shall come to an immediate vote on the proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out the last word in the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, an amendment which I think has not yet been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is in order and will proceed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, since the days when the mother of James and John asked for an important appointment for those two apostles, one on the right hand and the other on the left, when the Master came into His kingdom, until now, the question of who shall be greatest has been one of the most difficult and troublesome which men have ever encountered. And that is really the essence of this question. Men object to the greatness and importance and privileges of the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations do have great privileges and great power, and it is a committee which any man may well have an ambition to serve on. But there is a primacy in the order of things in this House and in Congress which cannot be overlooked. Shakespeare has well said, "Where two men ride of a horse one must ride behind."

A MEMBER. Oh, no; that is Hudibras.

Mr. GARFIELD. If Hudibras said it, it is none the less good; and the necessity of having the appropriations of this Government made, and made only by one responsible group of men, cannot be argued down by any of our ambitions or any of our personal desires. It is a question which stands out impersonally, high above all our little ambitions. It ought to so stand for its relation to the public good, and not for its relation to my ambition or yours.

But I wish to say for the comfort of those who may have any sort of jealousy of the power of the Committee on Appropriations, that it is by no means a one-sided question. I know that no man can do his full duty on the Committee on Appropriations without incurring the risk of becoming one of the most unpopular men in the House. He must tread on the toes of a great many people. He must run counter to the wishes of a large number of good men, as well as of committees. It is anything but an enviable place, although it is a powerful one.

I do say, sir, without the slightest question in my own mind of the truth of the statement, that the scattering of these appropriations as suggested by gentlemen here, will be absolutely breaking down all economy and good order and good management of our finances. It cannot be otherwise.

We know the length of our session depends on the appropriation bills. Whatever other things fail, these must pass. However far into the hot weather of the summer we go, we must go by the pressure of the appropriation bills; and unless we say to one committee take this in charge and make it your chief business, we give you the primacy, we give you the priority, we waive all other things off to carry this through and accomplish it—I say unless we do that, there can be no reasonable end to our session. And there can be no safety to our Treasury. I hope, therefore, gentlemen will not break down the old conservative habits we have thrown around the Committee on Appropriations.

I only regret our friends on the other side are not willing to throw away that clause suggested by the Speaker that has let in so much legislation on the appropriation bills and which, in my judgment, has made this raid on that committee possible. I think if they had no extraneous legislation put on these bills whatever, the jealousy and envy and ill-feeling and antagonism would all have disappeared before now. But it is too late now to remedy that; I suppose possibly it cannot be remedied in this House; but at any rate let us swallow our disappointments and reduce our feeling of hostility, and let the Appropriations Committee stand as it stands in the rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In order that the House may arrive at a proper understanding of this matter, which has been discussed at length in the light of the long experience the gentleman himself has had serving upon and at the head of that Committee on Appropriations, let me ask whether or not it is not the fact that the great bulk of the work that devolves upon that committee in the matter of the disbursements of the revenue of this Government is not a matter of discretion with the committee at all, but that four-fifths of it, if not more, is made in absolute obedience to the law and without discretion on the part of that committee at all?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; considerably more than four-fifths fixed by law.

Mr. COOK. Then why could not any other committee do it if the committee is bound by the law?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Georgia does not rise from his seat to suggest an interruption.

Mr. COOK. Well, I rise now to ask the gentleman, is not every other committee as much bound by the law as the Committee on Appropriations?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to move an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. At this time no further amendment is in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Amendments to the amendments are now pending, and parliamentary law does not admit of further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has offered an amendment to the original clause, and the gentleman from Mississippi has offered a substitute for the original clause, and there is now pending an amendment to each one of those amendments. That is as far as can be gone under the rules of the House. Until these amendments to the amendments are disposed of in some way no other amendment is in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for the reading of the pending amendments.

The amendments were read.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask whether there is not pending an amendment to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. It is pending.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to be recognized on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] who is now on the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am willing to withdraw the amendment striking out the last word.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania is on the floor, and we desire to hear him.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Let me ask a parliamentary question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If these amendments be adopted, will they have the effect of passing over the present appropriation bills, now completed or nearly completed, to the new committees to which they have been assigned, and are they to go over the whole work de novo, and thus keep us here three or four months longer?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If it is not a parliamentary question that will be the effect of the adoption of these amendments to the rules as reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Chairman, said well when he remarked to this House that the Committee on Appropriations was a committee of immense moment, that stupendous matters were submitted to it for its consideration. Then confine it, with this qualification with regard to its powers, to the legitimate business which would naturally under the rules come before it. Why make it a monopoly?

I concede, as that committee is now composed, it is made up of men of character, of standing, and intelligence. Cannot the same thing be said with regard to other committees, which have under control many matters connected with the Government, which do not now have the power to make appropriations? Those other committees, if this recommendation of the Committee on Rules be carried out, will be merely clerks to the Committee on Appropriations, merely sub-committees to examine subject-matters referred to them. When they spend their time on those subjects to whom do they report? In fact, they report not to the House, but to the Committee on Appropriations. There is no reason for this. If it were the case that there were but thirteen gentlemen who had the qualification to say what amount of money should be appropriated for this branch of the service and what for another, if they had the only intellect in this House for that purpose, there might be some reason for the adoption of such a rule. But, sir, such is not the fact.

I maintain that the standing committees who have charge of the appropriation of the moneys to the Army, the Navy, and the Post-Office Department ought to have those measures come before the Committee of the Whole House upon their recommendation, and that their recommendation should not be in effect made to the Committee on Appropriations.

I said the other day, when I had the floor and was making some remarks on this subject, I would not vote against the adoption of these rules with regard to this one question if it was to affect their passage generally; but I maintain that the power can be more safely placed in the Committee of the Whole House where all may have opportunity for debate and where there is no chairman of a Committee on Appropriations either to move that the committee rise or in the House to call the previous question. The question of the appropriations to be made to the different branches of the Government is one that legitimately belongs to the Committee of the Whole House. It does not belong to any committee selected by the Speaker.

I am in favor of not robbing the Committee on Appropriations of any power that naturally belongs to them; but the fault I find is that they should be the big sponge that is to absorb all subjects connected with the different branches of this Government. There is no principle of national policy in it. It is against the idea of parliamentary law. I do not want to infringe upon a single right that belongs to the Committee on Appropriations, but at the same time I do not want to load them down with the whole legislation of this House upon the subject of appropriations.

Mr. BROWNE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BROWNE. I desire to make a privileged motion. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope the committee will not rise until a vote is had on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BROWNE, there were—ayes 82, noes 71.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; 32 members voting therefor, being more than one-fifth of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BLACKBURN, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BROWNE, to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 92.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not call for further count.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Rules, and had come to no resolution thereon.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN OHIO.

Mr. CONVERSE. I rise to present a privileged report, a report of a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House and of the Senate appointed to confer on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 582) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Columbus, Ohio, and transferring certain counties from the northern to the southern district, in said State, after a full and free conference, do recommend as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to said bill, and do concur in the same.

GEORGE L. CONVERSE,
D. B. CULBERSON,
BENJAMIN BUTTERWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.
A. G. THURMAN,
A. H. GARLAND,
MATT H. CARPENTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CONVERSE. This is the unanimous report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not agree to that report, and call for a vote upon it. I move to lay the report on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I call for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KEIFER. Pending the demand for the yeas and nays I move that the House do now adjourn.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following requests for leave to withdraw papers from the files of the House:

Of Mr. EVINS, for leave to withdraw papers in the case of C. L. Keller, there being no adverse report thereon; and

Of Mr. CALDWELL, for leave to withdraw papers in the cases of Messrs. Allard & Crozier, of Paducah, Kentucky, and of W. H. Slack, of Paducah, Kentucky, there being no adverse report thereon.

These requests will be referred to the Committee of Claims, which has charge of the cases to which they relate; and hereafter the Chair will refer all such requests, whether the cases have been reported upon adversely or not, to the committees having charge of the subjects to which they relate.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HUMPHREY, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family;

To Mr. KILLINGER, for one week;

To Mr. HUBBELL, until Thursday next, on account of important business;

To Mr. URNER, for two days, on account of important business; and
To Mr. WARNER, for four days, on account of important business.

The motion of Mr. KEIFER was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 30, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. WILSON. In relation to the report made by my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. MORTON] upon the subject of international fisheries, I desire to state that upon submitting that report yesterday he gave notice that on Tuesday next he would move to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering that subject. If allowable, I desire to have the Journal corrected by an entry to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The statement to which the gentleman refers was in the nature of debate and appears in the RECORD. It is not necessary that it should be entered upon the Journal.

The Journal of yesterday was approved as read.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair at the instance of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] asks consent that the governor of West Virginia, Hon. Henry M. Mathews, and gentlemen accompanying him, Honorables Jonathan M. Bennett, John Brannan, and J. N. Camden, distinguished citizens of West Virginia, be admitted to the privileges of the floor for to-day and to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. WHITE. I object to anybody but the governor.

The SPEAKER. The governor is entitled to admission under the rule of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the gentleman will not be illiberal and unkind.

Mr. WHITE. We must stop at some point, or we shall be incommoded by the number admitted to the floor.

Mr. WILSON. Do not stop it on me, when every one else has had requests for such courtesies granted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON?]

There being no objection, the request was granted.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN OHIO.

Mr. CONVERSE. I notice by the RECORD of this morning that in relation to the report of the committee of conference on the bill of the House No. 582, to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Columbus, Ohio, &c., it is stated that upon the reading of the report Mr. GARFIELD demanded the yeas and nays.

That is not according to my recollection. My recollection is that the vote was taken upon agreeing to the report, and the Chair declared that the report was agreed to, and thereupon a motion was made to reconsider that vote and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; and while the Chair was putting that question, Mr. GARFIELD called for the yeas and nays to the report.

The SPEAKER. That is correct, but the Chair never takes advantage of any member in any respect in regard to such matters. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] claimed the right to have the question taken on ordering the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the report, notwithstanding the viva voce vote that had been taken. The Chair would state in addition that the call for the yeas and nays was in the nature of a further count upon agreeing to the report. If the Chair did not allow that to be done, he might arbitrarily decide that a bill had passed when some member was on the floor demanding the yeas and nays upon it. It has been the uniform practice of the Chair in all instances never to deny the right of a member to call for the yeas and nays under such circumstances. The Chair would state also that the conference report will come up immediately this morning after such matters as can be disposed of by unanimous consent shall have been disposed of.

ERIE AND WABASH SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals:

Resolved, That the Committee on Railways and Canals are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for a public survey for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of constructing a ship-canal from Toledo, Ohio, by way of the Wabash and Erie Canal, to the navigable waters of the Wabash River at or near La Fayette, Indiana, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

INTERNATIONAL SHEEP AND WOOL SHOW.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3982) to authorize and direct the Commissioner of Agriculture to attend in person or by deputies the international sheep and wool show, to be held in the Centennial building, Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, September, A. D. 1880, and to make full and complete report of the same, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF ALLEGHENY RIVER.

Mr. WHITE, by unanimous consent, submitted the report of General H. D. Wright, Chief United States Engineers, upon the expenditure of the appropriation for the improvement of the Allegheny River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

DEATH OF HON. RUSH CLARK.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent that the hour fixed for the delivering of eulogies upon my late colleague from Iowa, Hon. RUSH CLARK, be changed from two o'clock to-morrow until immediately after the morning hour to-morrow.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ACKLEN. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ACKLEN. I dislike to occupy the valuable time of this House in a matter of personal interest, but my attention has been called to an article in the New York Herald and also in the Detroit Post and Tribune——

The SPEAKER. Do those articles affect the gentleman in his representative capacity?

Mr. ACKLEN. They do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. ACKLEN. They are so grossly untrue and such a vile attack upon me, not only as a gentleman but as a Representative, that a proper sense of justice to my constituents as well as to myself forces me to speak that my silence may not be misconstrued. I quote the following from the Detroit Post and Tribune of January 26:

On the 13th of January, taking advantage of a moment when no other member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was present, ACKLEN rose in the House and declared as appears in the official report of the proceedings of Congress:

"Mr. ACKLEN. I ask unanimous consent that the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in relation to the claims of certain citizens against the government of Nicaragua be referred to the Committee of the Whole and ordered to be printed.

"There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly."

The alleged report thus handed in by ACKLEN was received, duly printed, and laid upon the desks of members. Some days afterward the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations were astonished at seeing these proceedings in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The chairman asked ACKLEN what it meant, and received an unsatisfactory reply. Accordingly he called the committee together and summoned ACKLEN before them, when it appeared that neither the committee nor the chairman had ever made, nor authorized, nor read the report which ACKLEN had palmed off on the House as the report of the committee; and, further, the committee would not agree to any such report. ACKLEN was then informed that he must withdraw that report and apologize to the House, or vigorous proceedings would be instituted to expel him in disgrace.

The article then proceeds to say that I apologized to the House and withdrew the report, but that this was done "in a quiet way, and at such a moment as to attract the least attention. But those who understood it explained to the other members, and a hot feeling of indignation has been growing ever since."

I need hardly say, Mr. Speaker, that this is perhaps one of the most willful and malicious perversions of fact on record.

On Monday, January 19, my colleague, Mr. KING, who had lately returned from Louisiana, called my attention to the article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, quoted in the extract which I have read, and also to a report, No. 86, second session Forty-sixth Congress, which bore his name. I informed him at once that there was evidently a mistake, as I had never made any such request of the House nor offered any such report as coming from his committee; that I had requested to have a report made by me in the Forty-fifth Congress, with manuscript attached, (Report No. 96, Forty-fifth Congress, second session,) printed, as it referred to a matter already on the public Calendar, and that I would gladly ask that the report bearing his name be withdrawn and make a statement to relieve him from any embarrassment in the case. Now, what was it I said on January 13? On this point I submit the following letter from the chief reporter of this House:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1880.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your request, the reporter on duty at the time you made your statement to the House, January 13, has examined his notes, and the following is an exact transcript of them:

"Mr. ACKLEN. I ask that a report be printed in a couple of cases already on the public Calendar.

"So ordered."

Very respectfully, yours,

J. J. MCELHONE.

Hon. J. H. ACKLEN.

How was it, then, that my old report of the Forty-fifth Congress, with the manuscript attached, which I requested to be printed to accompany a matter already on the public Calendar, came to be printed as Mr. KING'S report? Why, simply in this way—but first I desire to here submit the following letter from the journal clerk of the House:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 30, 1880.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry as to my recollection of the circumstances attending your request on January 13, to have a report printed, I can merely say that I remember the confusion in the House was so great at that time that I could not understand at the desk what it was you desired, and left it and came up the aisle near your desk to ascertain. I was much hurried, and the confusion was very great, but I recollect your stating something about a matter on the public Calendar, though I could not hear very distinctly. I judged that you wanted to make a report to go on the Calendar. Mr. KING'S name was in pencil-mark on the outside of the wrapper, and this naturally led me to suppose that the request was to print a paper in connection with some case on the public Calendar, or else to reprint your report of the previous Congress, which on examination of the papers I found to be incorporated therein.

Very respectfully, yours,

HENRY H. SMITH,
Journal Clerk.

Hon. J. H. ACKLEN.

Now, in the Forty-fifth Congress I was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and had referred to me the petitions of Woolsey Teller and Eliza Livingston. On these I made a report, (No. 96, Forty-fifth Congress, third session,) which simply recommended the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to take such steps as in his opinion may not be incompatible with the public interests to secure an early settlement and adjustment of the claims of Woolsey Teller and Eliza Livingston, citizens of the United States, and other citizens thereof against the government of Nicaragua, by an international arbitration or otherwise.

This report, however, contains all the facts and papers, and numbers ten printed pages.

During the latter part of the Forty-fifth Congress I was so seriously unwell that I did not attend the sessions of the House, and my report was therefore not acted upon. The Senate in the mean time acting upon the suggestions of the Secretary of State, appointed Hons. HAMLIN, CONKLING, KIRKWOOD, EATON, and MORGAN a committee on the part of the Senate to examine the papers on file in the Department of State in all claims of our citizens against the government of Nicaragua.

Following then in the footsteps of the Senate, on Wednesday, April 23, 1879, in the morning hour, after the call of committees for reports, (see page 742, RECORD, first session Forty-sixth Congress,) I introduced in substance, on the part of the House, the same resolution which had passed the Senate. Finding that my resolution was likely to stick in the morning hour without action, as this stage in our legislative proceedings is seldom reached, I, on May 5, 1879, sent a copy of this resolution and accompanying papers to the Committee on Foreign Affairs through the petition-box. (See page 1069, RECORD, first session Forty-sixth Congress.) By doing this I had two chances of reaching it for action: one in the morning hour; the other when the committee might report it to the House. The Committee on Foreign Affairs referred the matter to Mr. KING, and I gave him my old report, together with a manuscript statement of the action of the Senate. On June 30, just before the adjournment of the extra session, this resolution, which was pending in the morning hour, was by unanimous consent (see pages 2440 and 2441, RECORD, first session Forty-sixth Congress) placed on the public Calendar, where it now stands. (See Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.) It here appears as follows:

June 30—Mr. ACKLEN:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, which committee shall have power to sit during the recess, to inquire into all claims of citizens of the United States against the government of Nicaragua for indemnity for lives of relatives taken, wounds and other personal injuries inflicted, and property taken, injured, or destroyed, which claims have heretofore been filed in the Department of State and now remain pending and unsatisfied; and said committee shall ascertain and determine what amounts and to what persons the government of Nicaragua is liable to make compensation on account thereof, and report the same, with the evidence in reference thereto, to Congress at its next session; and said committee shall give such public notice as it may deem necessary of the times and places when and where it will sit to hear said claims and testimony in support of the same, and shall have power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths. It shall also obtain and use all proofs relative thereto on file in the Department of State and such other evidence as any party in interest may produce and offer that it may deem pertinent thereto. It shall have power to employ a clerk and a stenographer; and the necessary expenses of said committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on the vouchers of the chairman of said committee.

Having it now on the public Calendar, where it might be reached any day, I naturally lost all interest in the same matter before the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I therefore asked my colleague, Mr. KING, to return me the report and manuscript which I had given him, because it can be readily seen I might have use for them any day. Finding that my old report had been pretty well exhausted—it was my first congressional report and I scattered them extensively—I concluded to have it reprinted together with the manuscript statement of the Senate's action. This action is of frequent occurrence in both Houses, so I therefore made the request on January 13, 1880, as stated in the letter of the chief reporter of the House, and not as it appears in the RECORD.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, through an error for which I am in no wise responsible or to blame, have I been made the object of bitter, unjust, and scurrilous newspaper abuse. These articles have been spread the length and breadth of the land, and therefore, after consulting with members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, among whom I am proud to number personal friends, I offer the following, ask its passage and reference to that committee, that my exoneration may be as full as the attack has been foul.

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and they are hereby, requested to examine into the truth or falsity of the statement read by Mr. ACKLEN from the Detroit Post and Tribune, and report back to this House.

Mr. WILSON. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I desire to make one remark. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] has never been summoned before the committee by its order. What may have occurred between him and the chairman of the committee I do not know. The first intimation the Committee on Foreign Affairs had of this subject, so far as I know, was that a member of the committee, General KING, of Louisiana, communicated to the committee the fact that a report had been made by Mr. ACKLEN. General KING held that this report had done him injustice; that it placed the Committee on Foreign Affairs in a very improper light before the House, and that some explanation was necessary. Thereupon General KING produced a statement which he said Mr. ACKLEN would make upon the floor of the House, if acceptable to the committee, and that if acceptable to the committee it would be acceptable to him. The statement was read by Mr. KING, and subsequently communicated by Mr. ACKLEN to the House.

I think it proper to say this much in justice to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and also in justice to General KING, my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who is not now on the floor.

Mr. ACKLEN. There can be no possible objection to the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. Reserving my right to object, I ask that it be again read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana has risen to a question of privilege in reference to a matter which the Chair thinks does affect him in his representative capacity.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman may have a right to raise the question of privilege; but the question whether the House will adopt the resolution he submits is another thing. I would like to hear the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again read.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Committee on Foreign Affairs do not object to this I do not.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ACKLEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE SUSQUEHANNA.

Mr. TALBOTT, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Maryland, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to urge the necessity of an appropriation by the general Government for the purpose of deepening the channel of the Susquehanna between the city of Havre de Grace and Spesutia Island; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF PROCEEDINGS FOR TO-MORROW.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that by a resolution adopted some days since on motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] to-morrow at two o'clock was fixed for the presentation of resolutions relating to the death of Mr. RUSH CLARK, lately a member from Iowa. This morning, before the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] came in, the gentleman from Iowa obtained consent to change the time heretofore fixed so as to have the resolutions come up immediately after the morning hour. The gentleman from New York will see that to-morrow has really been assigned for this purpose.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD subsequently said: I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the ceremonies in relation to the death of Mr. CLARK will take place to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal or after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Immediately after the morning hour.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Some of the committees will probably sit all day to-morrow, and other members may desire to visit the Departments. I would suggest, therefore, that the hour for the presentation of these resolutions be changed, and that they be offered immediately after the reading of the Journal, with the understanding that no other business shall be transacted.

The SPEAKER. If the time be changed as suggested, no other business will be done, because the adjournment will take place immediately upon the conclusion of these proceedings. The gentleman from New York suggests that the delivery of eulogies be commenced immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. PRICE. It is suggested to me by several gentlemen around me that that would be a better arrangement. It may be so; but I cannot see it. If these eulogies amount to nothing, if they are only a matter of form, then I suppose empty benches will answer just as well as the ordinary attendance of members; but if it means anything to say a few words in reference to the life and character of a deceased colleague, it certainly means that the proceedings are worth listening to by at least a few members.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I have no desire to interfere with the arrangement made by the gentleman from Iowa. I withdraw my suggestion.

CONSTRUCTION FUND FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs a bill (H. R. No. 3983) to provide a permanent construction fund for the Navy, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that at a future time I shall ask the assignment of a special time for the consideration of this bill.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask unanimous consent to present for reference to the Committee on Agriculture, and to be printed in the RECORD, a very important petition—a petition of J. O. B. Renick and others, citizens of Ohio, praying for the creation of a commission under national authority to have charge of the investigation of the nature and treatment of contagious diseases of domestic animals.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the names. It is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the State of Ohio, being interested in the great agricultural industry of the country, respectfully direct the attention of your honorable body to the imperative necessity that exists for the creation of a commission, under national authority, to have charge of the investigation of the nature and treatment of contagious diseases of domestic animals, and—with the concurrence and sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury—to adopt and enforce such reasonable rules and regulations as may be necessary to prevent the importation and dissemination of these diseases, as well as to eradicate such as may exist.

In view of the magnitude of the interest we represent, and the importance and rapid growth of our live-stock export trade, now imperiled on account of the danger apprehended from this cause by our foreign customers, we beg most respectfully but earnestly to press upon the attention of our Senators and Representatives in Congress that the necessity for immediate action is most urgent.

In our judgment the commission should consist of not less than three members—say one competent and experienced veterinary surgeon, one practical stock-grower, and the third a business man—familiar with questions relating to commerce in live stock.

It seems obvious, from the well-known fact that these contagious diseases increase with the increase of domestic animals and the multiplication of facilities for their transportation, that the Government of the United States, representing a larger live-stock interest than any other country in the world, should establish and maintain a permanent commission whose sole duty it should be to have charge of this subject.

The Commissioner of Agriculture, as well as other heads of Departments at Washington, however competent they may be, would not be able to devote the time necessary for the proper discharge of these onerous duties.

We therefore pray your honorable body to provide at once for the appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, of such a commission, with an adequate appropriation for its support.

DECEMBER, 1879.

REFUNDING INTERNAL-REVENUE TAXES.

Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, (and by request,) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3984) to refund certain duplicate internal-revenue taxes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

POST-OFFICE DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to this House the Post-Office deficiency bill, with exception of items of appropriation relative to "star service," by the 5th day of February next.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Before that resolution is acted on——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do most emphatically object to be instructed by a gentleman who knows nothing about the business of that committee.

LIGHTING PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3985) to reduce the expenditures of the Government in lighting the public buildings of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

M. F. CLARK.

On motion of Mr. GILLETTE, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 76) for the relief of M. F. Clark was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

UNITED STATES COURTS OF OHIO.

Mr. BRIGHT. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business coming over from yesterday's session, which will again be read, the pending question being on the demand for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House and of the Senate appointed to confer on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 582) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Columbus, Ohio, and transferring certain counties from the northern to the southern district in said State, after a full and free conference, do recommend as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to said bill, and do concur in the same.

GEORGE L. CONVERSE,
D. B. CULBERSON,
BENJAMIN BUTTERWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.
A. G. THURMAN,
A. H. GARLAND,
MATT H. CARPENTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman in charge of the report to allow me to make a statement. My absent colleague——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, my absent colleague, Mr. BUTTERWORTH, of Cincinnati, explained to me before he was called away from the city yesterday that in signing this report as he has done he did not intend to commit himself to the support of the bill. It appeared to him afterward that the signing of the report carried the approval of the whole bill with it, and put him in a position he did not desire to occupy. He says he signed the report with this view: that if the bill was to pass the amendment of the Senate was a good one and ought to be concurred in. But it did not appear to him, as he saw afterward, that the only action the House could take upon this was simply to concur in this amendment, and that did pass the bill. It was on that account I desired last night to stop any proceedings on it in order that I might put him right upon the record; for, in signing this report, he would appear to be approving the whole measure.

I wish to say further he has looked into that more than I have. Doubtless his constituents have more interest in it than mine. Although it takes some counties from the northern judicial district, yet his opinion was, and I understand that to be the view of a number of gentlemen from the southern part of the State, that it would be a great inconvenience to so send the business of a considerable portion of the counties in the eastern quarter of the State, perhaps the southeastern quarter, where their connection is mainly by river with Cincinnati and more inconvenient, as they think, than it would be with Columbus, being a sort of third or middle district although not in terms a district, and dividing the jurisdiction of the court by compelling the judge, whose residence is in Cincinnati, to travel between the two cities, Cincinnati and Columbus, to transact the judicial business of his district.

I have stated this in order that gentlemen here may see precisely the nature of the objection to this bill. The only possible way that objection can now get any voice or have any force is to vote against the conference report altogether. I have simply made this explanation in justice to my colleague, not having myself sufficiently studied it to have as good an opinion as I ought to have to take action on it.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire a word of explanation in reply to my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD.] If any gentleman will look at the map of the State of Ohio, he will find it lies almost in a square. The State is divided into two judicial districts by a line running nearly through the center of it from east to west, thus forming the northern and southern judicial districts of Ohio. The northern judicial district is divided into eastern and western divisions, one court being at Cleveland, and the other twice a year at Toledo. The people of the southern district are obliged to go to the city of Cincinnati, in the very southwestern corner of the district and of the State, to attend the Federal courts. The southern district from northeast to southwest is not less than two hundred and seventy-five miles in length. And for nearly twenty years the people of Southeastern Ohio have been going that distance to attend the Federal courts instead of being allowed a court near to their own homes. The bill transfers eight counties from the northern to the southern judicial district of Ohio, and then divides the southern district into a western and eastern division, with twenty-nine counties in the latter, and provides for a court twice a year at Columbus, in the eastern division.

We have, Mr. Speaker, eleven railroads centering at the city of Columbus, and radiating from it like the spokes of a wagon-wheel. There are over seventeen hundred miles of railroad already laid and in use in this eastern subdivision of the southern judicial district. Out of the twenty-nine counties which it is proposed to put into this subdivision, there are twenty that are now obliged to travel through the city of Columbus, and one hundred and twenty miles further, in order to get justice, as administered by Federal law. Those counties embrace 7,314,017 acres of land, out of 25,201,743 in the entire State. And to show you the importance of this measure, I desire to give some other statistics. Our vote last year, in the twenty-nine counties, was 195,560 (showing a population of nearly a million) out of 670,711 votes cast in the entire State.

Our property upon the tax duplicates in this eastern subdivision was by the statistics published last year $411,186,424, while the taxable property in the entire State was $1,552,577,504, and we paid for State and local taxes in that subdivision $5,723,520.69, out of a total tax of $26,324,445.30 in the entire State. From the statistics of our State it appears that there were during the same year 9,851 money judgments rendered in the State courts in this subdivision out of 34,750 in the entire State. The amount of the money judgments during the year in the twenty-nine counties was $4,827,525, and in the whole State was $17,918,225, showing over one-fourth—nearly one-third—of the entire legal business of the State is transacted in this subdivision.

There is another fact that I desire to call attention to: it is that Ohio is the second State in the Union in its production of iron and coal, and two-thirds of it is the product of this eastern division.

In that same connection, Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed to say to the gentleman from Michigan and his Committee on Manufactures, who have, on my motion, the subject of tests of iron and steel before them, that in tests that were made some years ago at Watertown, New York, certain Ohio iron was found to possess a tensile strength of over ninety thousand pounds to the square inch, while the best Swiss iron had a tensile strength of only eighty thousand pounds to the square inch, thus showing iron from Southeastern Ohio to be the best in the world.

But, sir, what have the people of Southeastern Ohio done that nearly a million of them should be compelled to travel from one hundred to two hundred and seventy-five miles in order to reach a Federal court, while other States and localities are allowed courts near at hand? I have looked at the records a little, and desire to remind gentlemen that other portions of the United States are allowed convenient facilities for the transaction of judicial business, while very little has been extended to us, as will appear from the consideration of the following facts: I find from the records that the northern district of Ohio has two courts, that the State of Connecticut has two courts, that the State of New Hampshire has two courts, that Indiana has three courts, Kentucky three, Maine three, Tennessee three, West Virginia three, little Vermont has three, North Carolina has six, and Virginia has seven—old Virginia, the State that gave this very eastern subdivision of the judicial district of Ohio to the Union without money and without price, with all its rich mines and fertile lands.

Mr. WILSON. She gave the whole State of Ohio.

Mr. CONVERSE. Yes, as my friend reminds me, she gave the whole State of Ohio, without money and without price; she gave the whole State of Indiana, without money and without price; all of Illinois, without money and without price; all of Michigan, without money and without price; all of Wisconsin, without money and without price; and she carved out of her territory the State of Kentucky, and afterward, upon the political dissecting board, she was dismembered of one of her very cheeks, from which was formed West Virginia. God bless old Virginia, the mother of States and of Presidents! [Applause.] She has seven Federal courts, and I say if she wanted seventeen she should have them all by my vote. New York has twelve courts.

We have an area in this subdivision which is now denied a court greater than any one of eight States of this Union, namely, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Vermont, Rhode Island. It is twice as large as Connecticut and five times as large as Delaware. And I desire to remind gentlemen that the State of Rhode Island has two courts now, and yet into this eastern subdivision which is denied a court you can put eight States like Rhode Island, and there would be room for almost one more, making almost nine.

We have a larger population than existed in twenty-two of the States or any one of the nine Territories at the last Federal census, namely, Alabama, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Vermont, and West Virginia.

Why are the people of Southeastern Ohio required to travel to the city of Cincinnati for justice? There are but two hundred thousand people in the city of Cincinnati, and there are nearly a million who are compelled to travel to obtain justice more than one hundred miles. For whose benefit? For the benefit of less than a hundred lawyers and about thirty saloon and hotel keepers. And that is all there is of it.

Here is a letter from a former member of this House, from which I desire to read at least a few words. I refer to Mr. Danford, whom the gentlemen on the other side all know, and who lives in Eastern Ohio. He says:

> Yours of yesterday received. I have noticed the pending of bill providing for United States courts at Columbus. It is a matter of great interest to us here. We are compelled from this county (Belmont) to travel through Columbus and one hundred and twenty-five miles beyond whenever any of the numerous foreign corporations doing business in this State choose to drag us there. In fact the inconvenience of the United States courts is almost a denial of justice to our people.

I have here also a letter from Justice Swayne, of the Supreme Court of the United States, who has practiced law and sat on the bench for more than forty years in that part of the State and is familiar with the courts and with the people. He says:

> In answer to your note of yesterday, I have no hesitation in saying that in my judgment the public convenience would be much promoted by having two terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States held at Columbus, Ohio, every year.
> No one can look at the map of the southern district without being struck by its large and inconvenient extent.
> The judges, clerk, marshal, and district attorney could serve at both places as they do at Toledo and Cleveland in the northern district. The additional expense to the United States would be the rent of the necessary rooms, which would be trifling. The experiment is found to work well in the northern, and I cannot doubt it would do so in the southern district.

Mr. WILSON. It would save mileage to the Government.

Mr. CONVERSE. Yes, it would save mileage to the Government. It would save mileage to witnesses, and it would save mileage to litigants. Justice Swayne adds:

> Such has been my opinion as to holding terms at Columbus for the last fifteen years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the increased jurisdiction of the Federal courts makes it necessary that justice should be brought home near to the people. The jurisdiction under the election laws, laws concerning patents, revenue laws, concerning coinage, banking, currency, crimes, the small amounts of which Federal courts now have jurisdiction, and the transfer of cases from State courts—in which it must be remembered that corporations foreign to the State are doing much business in railroading, insurance, &c., and can bring or transfer their causes to the Federal courts—all these make it necessary to bring the courts home near to the people.

I would like to mention a case which occurred in the county of my colleague who sits before me, [Mr. EWING.] There were two election trustees who innocently received an illegal vote. They were prosecuted at Cincinnati, and the expenses of travel, hotel bills, witness fees, and lawyers' fees, were $1,000—$500 apiece.

Prosecution under the revenue, patent, or election laws, to a man of moderate means who lives two or three hundred miles from the seat of justice, to a man of small property, means bankruptcy, and he will pay $30, $50, or $100 unjustly rather than be dragged off that distance to court, and thus justice is not only denied, but the distance of the courts serves as a means of oppression.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this report will be concurred in. This idea of going down the river for the purpose of attending court amounts to nothing. Cincinnati already has on the river one hundred and fifty miles under this bill. Her admiralty jurisdiction amounts to nothing, because the line of the State is the low-water mark on the west side of the river. The courts at Louisville, Covington, Charlestown, Wheeling, and Pittsburgh have that jurisdiction. There is no reason why people more than one hundred miles north of the city of Cincinnati should be required to go to that city in order to attend the Federal court. The court had better go to them. That would be the more economical course. The twenty-nine counties are all nearer and all better served—every one of them—by establishing the court at the city of Columbus than they would be by allowing it to remain at the city of Cincinnati.

I demand the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I desire to say a single word on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] yield to his colleague?

Mr. CONVERSE. How many minutes does the gentleman want?
Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Only two or three.
Mr. CONVERSE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.
Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. The gentleman who submits this conference report seems to argue that there is a disposition on the part of members to prevent a district court being established at Columbus. I do not understand that there is any such disposition. It is conceded on all hands that the southern district ought to be divided, and a district court established at Columbus or at Chillicothe. But my objection to this bill is that, under the guise of dividing this southern judicial district, the northern district is divided.

The northern judicial district embraces, I think, about three-eighths of the territory of the State. The courts in that district are held now in two places, Cleveland and Toledo. This bill contemplates the taking of eight counties from that northern district and adding them to the southern district. I object to that, and contend that there is no occasion whatever for it.

I would be glad if this House would vote down this report and recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order that it may be properly considered, so that a fair, impartial, and proper district may be formed, for which every member of this House can vote, and in which every citizen of Ohio can be accommodated and receive immediate and speedy justice. I hope the gentleman will consent to that.

Mr. CONVERSE. I yield five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. EWING.]

Mr. EWING. In reply to the statement of my friend who has just addressed the House, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] I call the attention of members to the fact that the counties of the northern district of Ohio affected by this bill are but eight in number, and that nearly all the people in those eight counties have a much easier and prompter access to Columbus than they have either to Cleveland or Toledo, where the courts of the northern district are now held. As to the counties in the southern district, which this bill provides shall have the privilege of sessions of the United States courts at Columbus, they have found it is so troublesome and expensive to transact their business in the Federal courts at Cincinnati that they have for many years past been seeking the erection of a new judicial district embracing the center and eastern portion of the State. Mr. Plants, Mr. Shellabarger, myself, and others, in former Congresses, have introduced and urged bills for that purpose.

This bill does not provide for a new judicial district. I may say, indeed, it adds nothing to the expense of the Federal administration of justice in the State of Ohio, while it accommodates a very large portion of our population, who are now subjected to exceedingly long and expensive travel to attend the sessions of the court in Cincinnati. All these counties in the southern district which by this bill are given the privilege of having their judicial business transacted at Columbus have their railroad center there. That is the city of our State easiest of access to them, while they lie much farther from Cincinnati, and their access to it is indirect and circuitous.

As my colleague [Mr. CONVERSE] has intimated, the route to Cincinnati by way of the river may be counted as nothing for all that part of our Ohio River border lying more than one hundred and fifty miles above Cincinnati—lying, say, above Lawrence County which with all the counties below it is left untouched by this bill. The river-route to Cincinnati for all the counties above Lawrence is slow and little resorted to. The splendid energy of Columbus in building railways into Southeastern Ohio is fast relieving the people of that part of our State of dependence on the river as a line of travel. The people of all that region can now reach Columbus much more promptly than Cincinnati. In fact, a large part of them now go through Columbus and thence one hundred and ten miles to the Federal courts at Cincinnati.

Now, I submit that as it involves practically no additional expense, this consideration of convenience should control the decision of the House and lead it to give to the people of Central and Eastern Ohio the privilege of having sessions of the district and circuit courts of the United States in Columbus. I hope that the House will vote to do so, by agreeing to the report of the conference committee.

Mr. WHITE. Does this provide for the appointment of another district judge?
Mr. EWING. Not at all.
Mr. WHITE. The judge of the southern district——
Mr. EWING. The judge of the southern district is simply required to hold terms of the circuit and district courts in Columbus.
Mr. CONVERSE. I now call for a vote.
The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.
The yeas and nays were not ordered.
The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.
Mr. CONVERSE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.
Mr. CONVERSE. The day after the House ordered that a committee of conference be requested upon this bill, I entered a motion to reconsider that order. I move that that motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.
The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. BRIGHT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3986) to amend sections 3285 and 3310 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PETER GILNER.

Mr. BAYNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3987) for the relief of Peter Gilner; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:
An act (H. R. No. 2188) for the relief of Thomas Kearney.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I now call for the regular order.
The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour commences at five minutes past one o'clock. This being Friday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

MICHAEL GRANERY AND OTHERS.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, Senate bill No. 695, for the relief of Michael Granery, Nicholas Wax, and Moliere Lange.
The question was upon ordering the bill to a third reading.
The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Michael Granery, Nicholas Wax, and Moliere Lange each the sum of $500, in refundment of so much money exacted from them as joint obligors on a bond taken by Colonel D. A. Pardee, provost-marshal of the district of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, in 1863, for the appearance of one B. F. Rhodes, the payment of which was improperly and illegally enforced by the marshal, in full and complete satisfaction thereof.
Mr. WHITE. I raise the point of order upon that bill that it contains an appropriation and should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.
Mr. KNOTT. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] will withdraw his point of order until I have made a statement of the facts.
Mr. WHITE. I would like to hear the statement, for in the absence of any statement I should insist upon my point of order.
Mr. KNOTT. This bill has three times passed the Senate of the United States, and it has three times been favorably reported to this House. I will state briefly the facts because of which the relief sought is claimed: In 1863 a man named B. F. Rhodes was arrested and taken before the provost-marshal at Baton Rouge, Louisiana. Rhodes being sick the provost-marshal determined to admit him to bail—a proceeding void perhaps in itself for want of competent authority. Rhodes executed his bond, his sureties being the beneficiaries named in this bill. The bond was given in the sum of $1,500, each of the sureties being bound for $500. Rhodes was immediately taken to the residence of his sister, where shortly afterward he died of small-pox. After his death the provost-marshal demanded of each of his three sureties the sum of $500. They refused to pay. Thereupon he arrested and imprisoned them, and while under this duress they were compelled to pay each the sum of $500.
Now, it is manifest that, even granting the provost-marshal had the right to take this bail-bond, there was no default either on the part of the principal or any of the sureties. In consideration of these facts, the Committee on the Judiciary has twice reached the conclusion unanimously that the money ought to be refunded to these parties. Their receipts taken from the provost-marshal show that they paid the money to him; and the report of the Provost-Marshal-General shows that the money was accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States, where it now is.
These men are in humble circumstances, and this sum, which is but a pittance to the United States, is a matter of great moment to them, and is justly their money. Three several times they have failed to obtain justice in this House, simply because their case was not reached upon the Private Calendar, although in each instance there was a unanimous report in their favor. I do hope that there will be no objection to this bill, and that these poor men may get this money to which they are entitled.
Mr. WHITE. I understand the gentleman to say that this prisoner died of small-pox before the time named in the bond for his appearance had expired.
Mr. KNOTT. Yes, sir.
Mr. WHITE. Why did not these men come earlier to Congress for relief? The circumstance occurred in 1863, I believe.
Mr. ROBERTSON. I will state that at every session of Congress since that time they have applied for relief. They have been vigilant.
Mr. WHITE. The bill seems to be right.
The bill was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.
Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. KNOTT. I am also unanimously instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back sundry bills for the relief of political disabilities, each bill being accompanied with a petition.

CHARLES CARROLL SIMMS.

The bill (H. R. No. 3988) to remove the political disabilities of Charles Carroll Simms, of Virginia, was read a first and second time.

The petition was read, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

I would respectfully request to be relieved from my political disabilities. I entered the Navy of the United States in October, 1839, and tendered my resignation as lieutenant in 1861. I would further state that I am not indebted to the United States Government.

CHARLES CARROLL SIMMS.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM B. TALLIAFERRO.

The bill (H. R. No. 3989) to remove the political disabilities of William B. Talliaferro, of Virginia, was read a first and second time.

The petition was read, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress:

The petition of William B. Talliaferro, a citizen of Virginia, respectfully represents that he was commissioned by the President of the United States as a captain in the Eleventh Regiment United States Infantry in April, 1847, and in August of the same year a major in the Ninth Regiment of Infantry; that these regiments were created for service during the war with Mexico and were disbanded and the officers and enlisted men were mustered out of service at the termination of the said war; that your petitioner was mustered honorably out of service at Fort Adams, Rhode Island, in September, 1848, as will appear by the returns made to the War Department, and now on file in the Adjutant-General's Office; that your petitioner afterward served in the army of the Confederate States as a general officer in the war between the Southern States and the United States, and for participation in that war against the Government of the United States was subject to the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; that he has believed that all such disabilities were relieved by the general act of Congress relieving disabilities, but he is advised that although he was only in the military service of the United States in regiments raised for the Mexican war, and has never been in the service of the United States since, that doubt exists as to whether his disabilities have been removed and he desires to remove all doubt on the subject. He therefore respectfully prays that an act may be passed for his relief.

WILLIAM B. TALLIAFERRO.

JANUARY 26, 1880.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I think this petition does not set forth any case for this House to act upon. The fourteenth amendment refers to no such war as the petitioner says he was engaged in. I am for one unwilling to pass a bill of this kind upon such a statement as is embraced in this petition. The petitioner says he was engaged in a "war between the Southern States and the United States." There is no such war recognized in our Constitution or laws. There was a war of rebellion against this Government; and to that the fourteenth amendment refers—not to a "war between the Southern States and the United States." Let the petitioner bring himself within the language of the constitutional amendment, and then we shall be prepared to act.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the petitioner describes himself as "an officer in the confederate service."

Mr. CONGER. Let the petition be again read.

The petition was again read.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, article 14 of the amendments to the Constitution imposes disabilities upon any person "who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof." This provision of the Constitution says nothing about a "war between the Southern States and the United States," or a war of any other kind against the United States. The petitioner, in order to bring himself within the provisions of that article when asking for the amnesty which two-thirds of Congress may grant, must show himself to have been engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or that he has given aid and comfort to the enemies thereof. Let a man who comes here asking amnesty of the Congress of the United States under the constitutional provision bring himself within that provision. If he was not engaged in insurrection or rebellion and has not given aid or comfort to the enemies of the United States he need not come to Congress at all. If he does come let him come and acknowledge his having been engaged in insurrection, in rebellion, in giving aid and comfort to the enemies of his country. Then he makes a proper occasion for asking amnesty of the Congress of the United States, but not till then.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the tone of this petition and the words in which it is expressed do not exhibit in the least any disposition to be hypocritical on the part of the petitioner. It is in the usual form. The words which the gentleman lays stress upon in the description of the war he was engaged in——

Mr. CONGER. It is in that very description, sir——

The SPEAKER. Oftentimes, in like manner, the facts in relation to the history of officers asking this relief have been stated in their petitions.

Mr. CONGER. I am not aware I ever heard on that point such a statement, and if it has been done I, for one, as a member of the House, shall continue to protest against giving such rose-colored terms to that upon which our Constitution imposes disabilities.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is always on the side of pensioners and in favor of relieving disabilities, and only for that reason made the statement he has.

Mr. CONGER. I myself do not rank pensioners and those who ask for amnesty exactly in the same class.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would erect all into full citizenship when they ask for relief from disabilities imposed by the Constitution, as well as accord pensions to all who have suffered for the Government.

Mr. KNOTT. As the Chair has already, and I think properly, replied to the gentleman from Michigan——

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not mean to reply to anybody, but merely meant to say this petition seemed to be in tone and language of the usual character of such prayers for relief.

Mr. KNOTT. Very well, sir, I demand the previous question.

Mr. HAYES. Read the petition again.

The petition was again read.

Mr. CONGER. I move the bill and report be referred back to the committee with a suggestion that a proper petition be filed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky, who is entitled to the charge of the bill and to be recognized, has called for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I made the motion which I have the right to make while I had the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair always accords the right to the member reporting a bill to test the sense of the House.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman desires to test the sense of the House on a two-thirds vote, he can do it.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire only to say, Mr. Speaker, after the gentleman from Michigan had taken his seat, I took the floor in my own right and demanded the previous question, after which some gentleman on the other side called for the reading of the petition. That is precisely the condition in which the case stands before the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 100, noes 54.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the House that a more respectful petition could not be presented to this body than Mr. Taliaferro has presented here, asking relief at our hands. Out of the great number of such bills passed by this House I undertake to say such criticism as has been offered on this petition was never presented before. If I rightly comprehend the ground of objection taken by the gentleman from Michigan, it is that this petitioner, not perhaps understanding the taste of the gentleman from Michigan on that subject, has not spoken of the recent war as a rebellion. He had, however, good authority for characterizing it as he did. The Supreme Court of this country has recognized what is termed the rebellion as a public war in this country.

But be that as it may, he has recognized the validity of the fourteenth amendment. He has shown he is in the category of those who are disabled by that amendment. If he has failed to characterize the war as a rebellion, he has certainly stated to us sufficient to show he gave aid and comfort in that war to the enemies of the United States; and, following this candid avowal, he has respectfully asked this body to do for him what it has done for hundreds. Under his peculiar circumstances, it is a matter of doubt whether he is under the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment. In order that all doubt on this subject may be cleared away, recognizing fully the competency of the Congress of the United States to remove that doubt, he comes here and humbly petitions as a citizen of the State of Virginia to the United States for this favor. If there is any sense of justice remaining in this body, I think this respectful petition will not be disregarded.

I now call for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. TALBOTT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first test the sense of the House by a division.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 172, nays 53, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—172.

Acklen,	Bingham,	Buckner,	Converse,

JOHN S. MAURY.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3990) to remove the political disabilities of John S. Maury; which was read a first and second time.

The petition was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner respectfully represents that prior to the year 1861 he was a lieutenant in the United States Navy, but upon the outbreak of the late rebellion he joined the confederate forces, and by reason of such participation in the rebellion he is, by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, placed under certain political disabilities which he respectfully prays your honorable bodies will by bill remove.

JOHN S. MAURY,
Late Lieutenant United States Navy.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that that petition is in the proper form provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and I have no objection to its reception and the action of the House thereon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the House will have none either.

Mr. CONGER. Of course the Chair has its wishes, and I have no desire to influence my friends around me. They take their responsibility; I take mine.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting therefor.

I. WILKINSON.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3109) to remove disabilities of I. Wilkinson.

The petition was read, as follows:

ANNAPOLIS, MARYLAND, January 21, 1880.

To the honorable United States Senate and House of Representatives:

I respectfully request to be relieved from all political disabilities imposed upon me by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution.

At the breaking out of the late war I resigned the commission of lieutenant which I held in the United States Navy to side with my native State of Virginia.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

I. WILKINSON.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting therefor.

JOHN OWINS.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3328) to remove the political disabilities of John Owins, of Portsmouth, Virginia.

The petition was read, as follows:

PORTSMOUTH, VIRGINIA, January 14, 1880.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

I respectfully represent that on the 7th day of March, 1842, I entered the United States Navy as a warrant officer, (gunner,) and resigned on the 19th day of April, 1861, to enter the confederate service.

I now respectfully ask that my political disabilities be removed by your honorable body.

Respectfully, JOHN OWINS.

Mr. CONGER. I make the same objection to that petition that I made to the other, that it does not bring the petitioner within the provisions of the Constitution, and I for one desire to say now that unless men who have been engaged in insurrection and rebellion and come here to ask amnesty of Congress according to the Constitution and the law—unless they put themselves within the provisions of the Constitution, if I am alone in it, I shall object to the consideration of their petitions.

Mr. KNOTT. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is unnecessary, and will submit the question on the engrossment and third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill; and being taken, the Speaker stated that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. CONGER. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 111, noes 42.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BURROWS. I rise to a question of order. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BURROWS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky demanded the previous question. The Chair stated he thought that was unnecessary, and submitted the question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill. If the previous question had been seconded, that would have carried the bill over the expiration of the morning hour. The previous question not having been seconded, the bill goes over till next Friday.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion, the Chair desires to lay before the House certain executive communications.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will do so with the understanding that the business the gentleman desires to call up shall give rise to no debate.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE GROUNDS SOUTH OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. HUNTON. I am instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to ask consent that House joint resolution No. 169, making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table for the purpose of concurring in the amendments.

There was no objection, and the bill with the Senate amendments thereto was taken from the Speaker's table.

That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the old canal, the grounds of the United States south of the Capitol, along the line of said canal. The commissioners of the District shall determine the plan of said work, employ the labor to do the same by the day, week, or month, and see that it is properly conducted, and shall disburse the money and make report of the same to Congress.

Mr. HUNTON. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

R. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MITCHELL, will please take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FINLEY. By Rule 129, the first and fourth Fridays of each month are objection days. This is the fifth Friday of the month. I desire to inquire whether this is objection or consideration day?

The CHAIRMAN. It is consideration day. The rule expressly provides that the first and fourth Fridays only shall be objection days.

Mr. FINLEY. The rule provides that the first and fourth Fridays of each month shall be objection days. This is neither the first nor the fourth Friday.

Mr. MCMAHON. I suppose that where certain days are fixed by the rule as objection days, all other days are consideration days.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the conclusion of the Chair.

GEORGE EYSTER.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2796) for the relief of George Eyster; reported from the Committee of Ways and Means by Mr. DUNNELL.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to George Eyster, of Philadelphia, the sum of $882.50, the same being the amount stolen from said Eyster while he was assistant treasurer of the United States by a subordinate in his office, without the fault or negligence of said George Eyster.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1448) for the relief of George Eyster, assistant treasurer of the United States at Philadelphia, having had the same under consideration, make the following report:

George Eyster was assistant treasurer of the United States at Philadelphia in September, 1873, when his accounts with the Government showed a deficit of $882.50. This amount had been stolen by a dishonest subordinate. All the facts in this case appear in a report made by the Committee of Ways and Means of the Forty-fourth Congress, and also by the same committee of the Forty-fifth Congress. The facts as therein set forth your committee make a part of this report. These facts are well sustained by the papers in the case, and are as follows:

Soon after the passage of the new mint law, approved February 12, 1873, and operative on and since April 1, 1873, the Treasury Department issued instructions for the examination of the gold coin in his office, so that such portion as fell below the limit of abrasion fixed in the law might be recoined. His office had on hand on the last-mentioned date, in gold coin, the sum of $6,134,320.

The work of separation was commenced and carried on as rapidly as the business of the office would warrant, and shipments for recoinage were made from time to time to the mint. At length, on the 8th day of September, 1873, when the work was nearly completed, and as a quantity of light coin ($315,060) was about to be sent away, it occurred to the cashier that it would be better to have it weighed, and it was accordingly done, and revealed the fact that one bag, supposed to contain $5,000 in quarter eagles, was $1,000 short.

When this discovery was made all the gold coin then in the office was also weighed, full weight as well as light, when it was discovered that one of the full-weight bags contained an excess of $200, leaving a net short of $800. The full-weight bag containing the excess had been counted, put up, and marked by the clerk who had heretofore charge of the receipt of coin from the customs-office. The bag referred to was one peculiar in appearance as well as in the manner in which it was marked. The "over" had necessarily a connection with the "short," and in this connection the peculiar character of the bag containing the excess was suggestive. Besides, it was discovered that the bag that was found to be short was an unseparated bag, although it had been placed among those that were "separated" and light.

Mr. Eyster immediately investigated the matter, summoned to his presence Benjamin F. Bond, the clerk referred to, and put to him many questions, both in private and before witnesses. His answers for the most part were equivocating and very unsatisfactory. He professed an ignorance of such matters that must or should have been within his knowledge.

The clerk expressed the conviction, before he had been examined by Mr. Eyster, that the loss would be laid to his (Bond's) charge, and when it was proposed to weigh the coin, Bond protested that it was useless to do that; that the money would be found all right.

Mr. Eyster, in view of the above facts, felt it his duty to discharge Bond, which he immediately did, and caused the remaining bags in the office bearing Bond's mark to be examined; whereupon they discovered that in numerous instances he had put up bags of quarter-eagles one or more pieces short, which would account for the increase in the deficit from $800 to $882.50, with the exception of a counterfeit half eagle found in one of his bags.

It is not at all probable that an honest man could put up a single bag with one piece short without finding his account for the day one piece over; but when this occurred sometimes twice in a single day or week, and very many times in a few weeks or months, without once finding he had anything over, if this was from carelessness, why was it not manifested just once or twice in having one of the bags over? No; the committee are of the opinion, based upon the facts of the case, that Bond was a dishonest clerk.

On Mr. Eyster's taking charge of the treasury at Philadelphia, he found this man in the office, and becoming aware of his capacity and usefulness, retained him not only in office, but promoted him, having no doubt of his original honesty.

Mr. Eyster some time since submitted all the facts in the case to the Solicitor of the Treasury, and was by him referred to the district attorney of the United States in Philadelphia.

The district attorney, in a letter dated February 28, 1876, discourages a prosecution in the United States court for the reason that, in his opinion, the offense is not punishable under any statute of the United States.

Mr. Eyster is of opinion that the coin was abstracted upon the theory that if once at the mint and melted, the absence of $1,000 in so great a quantity would either not be noticed at all, or else attributed to abrasion.

The committee feel fully satisfied that the loss of this coin was in no degree through any negligence or remission of the official duty of Mr. Eyster.

The petitioner first asked Congress to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to credit him with the sum of $882.50. Before Congress had passed any act thus authorizing the Secretary to credit this amount, the Secretary ordered Mr. Eyster to pay the amount of the deficit into the Treasury of the United States. Having done this the petitioner now asks that there be paid to him out of the Treasury of the United States the sum of $882.50. Your committee report back a substitute to H. R. No. 1448, and recommend its passage.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. REAGAN. Is the bill before the Committee of the Whole for consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. REAGAN. Only a few days ago a bill very similar to this in principle was before the House. How many others of a similar character there may be I know not.

This is a case of loss of the Government money in the hands of a bonded officer, through no fault or dereliction on the part of the Government. The bill proposes to relieve this officer, and is accompanied by a statement that even the man who is charged with having embezzled or stolen the money was not liable to prosecution. Now, of what use is it to require bonds of public officers if in every case in which public moneys pass out of their hands they are by some means to be relieved from the loss? What security is there for the public Treasury if we are to pursue this course of permitting public officers to trust whom they please with the management of money and when it is lost come to Congress for relief? If we are to adopt this principle of relieving all officers charged with the custody of public funds as soon as they lose those funds, without any fault, neglect, or omission of duty on the part of the Government, it seems to me we had better stop taking bonds at all and let these officers make up their accounts, crediting themselves with money stolen, and we taking no further trouble about it.

I repeat what I said a few days ago on a similar bill. Start these precedents as you are starting them in this Congress, and I predict that the cases coming to us for relief will increase with exceeding rapidity. If an officer finds that when there has been a loss of money intrusted to him he has nothing to do but to come to Congress and, notwithstanding his bonded obligation, obtain release, you will in a very short time find plenty of officers needing relief. We shall in this way directly encourage peculations upon the Treasury; we shall encourage bad practices and worse principles. When men accept these positions of responsibility and give bond for the faithful performance of their duties, they ought to understand that they are to take care of the public money intrusted to them or make up the defficiency.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, the report which has been read, a report of the Committee of Ways and Means, is I believe unanimous. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] must remember, if he will, that the action proposed in this bill corresponds with that pursued by the Government for very many years. I think there has not been a Congress from the foundation of the Government in which there did not arise one or more cases like this. Certainly there has been no session since the gentleman from Texas has been here when we have not relieved bonded officers of the Government from losses which they have sustained without any fault or negligence on their part. I believe that in all instances like this, of postmasters and other public officers, the committees have required it should be clearly proved that the officer was absolutely free from all possible fault or neglect in any way.

I hold, Mr. Chairman, that when an officer of the Government having possession of public funds, even though he has given bond, goes straight forward in the discharge of his duty without any shadow of neglect or fault, and is overtaken by the misfortune of having a portion of those funds abstracted by a dishonest clerk, the Government can very much better afford to pay him that money than he can afford to lose it.

Mr. MORSE. And in this case the clerk was not appointed by him.

Mr. DUNNELL. In this case, as the gentleman suggests, the clerk was not an appointee of the officer. He was in the office when Mr. Eyster took possession of it.

Mr. REAGAN. But was promoted by him.

Mr. DUNNELL. He was in the office when Mr. Eyster entered it, was regarded as an honest, upright clerk; such was his character up to the time when he was promoted by Mr. Eyster with the unanimous approval of the officers of the Government there.

Now, if we relieve this man as the bill proposes, I do not think it will be an encouragement to any man to be careless or negligent in the discharge of his duties as a public officer. If this man is allowed this sum of $882.50, I do not believe it will make him in the least degree careless or negligent hereafter, because if he should come here again for relief he must show an absolutely "clean bill." He must demonstrate that he was free from fault and negligence.

I hold that the Government cannot go to the extent which was proposed here in debate the other day. When an officer is overtaken by misfortune through the bad faith of some clerk of whom he has not the slightest suspicion, who has developed dishonesty under peculiar temptations, to hold the principal officer in cases of this kind absolutely responsible for the money thus abstracted would be too severe a rule.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we do not pay very exorbitantly claims coming before us here. I believe that more good claims are defeated in committees than bad claims passed; and, as I have said, I would rather see a doubtful case passed through occasionally than that this Government should deny justice to those who are entitled to it. I think this man is entitled to relief.

Mr. FINLEY. Has Mr. Eyster made good this money to the Government?

Mr. DUNNELL. He has.

Mr. FINLEY. The report does not show that.

Mr. DUNNELL. The report shows in the latter part that he asked the Treasury Department to credit him with the money that had been lost, and the Department would not do so.

Mr. SPARKS. It was charged to him.

Mr. DUNNELL. It was charged to him and he paid it. Now he comes in and asks that he be repaid.

Mr. SPRINGER. When this bill was reached on last Friday I objected to it, not for the reason that I objected to it on its merits, because I did not know what the merits of the case were, but since then I have had an opportunity to examine it. I think it is a bill which ought to pass, and for this reason: The Government of the United States can better afford to lose this sum of money than the officer in question, as it appears this officer was not in default in the slightest in this matter.

Mr. FINLEY. Let me inquire in this connection whether the officer was not in default in keeping in his employ a man whom the report says had been abstracting money daily, which he could not have done without this officer being guilty of laches?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer the gentleman from Ohio. The report shows the abstraction was without the knowledge of this public officer, but was so studiously concealed from him and covered up at the close of each month as to be absolutely beyond the power of reasonable diligence to detect.

The evidence in this case shows the public officer was without any fault. That he is an honest, efficient, and capable officer there is no dispute or question. When a public official, in the discharge of the ordinary duties of his office, is not guilty of the negligence in the protection of the public funds, but goes forward faithfully discharging his duties and exercising that reasonable precaution in guarding the public funds that ordinary business men would exercise in the management of their own business, I say it is unjust that such a man should suffer by reason of the dishonesty of a subordinate.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKNER. What reason can be given that this assistant treasurer did not take a bond for the faithful discharge of the duties of each one of his clerks?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know whether the law required him to do so or not, but I think the law should be so amended that each of these public officials who is charged with the disbursement and handling of public funds should give a bond to the Government, and be responsible to the Government upon that bond for the protection of the public funds which he handled, and that a public officer should not be required to be responsible for the dishonesty of subordinates who were in the office when he took charge of it, and for whose appointment he was not responsible.

I believe in the Government dealing fairly and justly with its public officials; and wherever a public officer has shown by his conduct that he has exercised the same diligence and the same care in the discharge of his public duties that a private individual would do, the Government can better afford to meet losses from these unavoidable accidents, unavoidable thefts, if I may use the harsh term which is perhaps proper in this case—that the Government is better able to sustain these losses than the public officer who is faithful, and not wanting in ordinary prudence and diligence in the protection of the public funds.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. McMILLIN. What I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois is this: You speak of this being a theft; now, if this public official keeps a thief in his office, ought he not to be held responsible for the occasion of that theft?

Mr. SPRINGER. After he finds out the man is a thief and he keeps him in office, then he should be held responsible. But that is not the case here.

Mr. McMILLIN. Ought he not to be diligent in inquiry?

Mr. FINLEY. That's it.

Mr. SPRINGER. He has been diligent. The evidence shows he was a faithful official, and used the ordinary precaution for securing honesty in the discharge of the duties of his office.

Mr. FINLEY. Who has the floor?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have the floor. I have not yet yielded it.

Mr. FINLEY. I thought the time for discussion had been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to an hour, as there has been no order closing debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. The five-minute rule does not apply until the general debate has been closed, and that has not yet been done. I now yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say one word, and that is to call attention to the fact that both the gentlemen who have spoken, the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Illinois, place the grounds upon which relief is asked in this case upon the fact that it is better for the Government to lose this money than for a private individual.

What is the Government of the United States as represented through its Treasury? Is it not the people, and the whole people, of the country? It has very often astonished me, sir, to hear gentlemen talking about the "Government" relieving the wants, necessities, or accidents of others. They seem to go upon the idea that the Government is a thing with exhaustless treasure, costing nobody anything, that there is no injustice in taking its funds from it, and that there is no moral impropriety in failing to protect it. But, sir, it is the people's Treasury, and if we vote a dollar of money out of that Treasury, and give it to some one not legally entitled to it, we take it wrongly from the people. I have never understood in the course of my life the philosophy which treats the property of the Government, and the using of Government moneys, in any other way than we treat any question transferring the money of one citizen to another. That is all there is of that point. I trust we shall not proceed upon the idea that we do no wrong to anybody by taking the money out of the Treasury. We take it from the people. We require them to be taxed to pay it. There is nothing disclosed in this that any precaution had been taken by this officer to protect himself against loss. He kept this man in office—the report shows that he found him there—a man of good reputation—he was handling money by the millions, no bond, no security asked of him. It was his own voluntary trusting of this man. Is there a man on this earth, managing his private business, who would trust in the hands of another man such vast sums of money with no steps taken for its security at all?

But, sir, independently of all that, I repeat what I said the other day on another case from New Orleans like this, and what I may have to repeat on a number to come, that whenever it gets to be fashionable to reimburse men who have lost money belonging to the Government of the United States, when the Government is in no default, you will find sub-treasurers, postmasters, internal-revenue officers—you will find that the whole brood will get to losing money constantly, and it will become a fashionable disease, and there will be no end to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yielded to the gentleman from Texas, supposing he intended to ask me a question, but as he has made a speech replying to a portion of the remarks I have submitted, I desire, therefore, to be heard further on this subject.

The gentleman from Texas misrepresents me. He states that I said it would be better for the Government to lose this money than for a private individual to lose it. I made that statement, however, with this addendum, that it would be better for the Government to lose it than for a private individual to lose it who was not in any way in default himself. I take the case of my distinguished friend from New York, who, perhaps, has a mercantile house being carried on in the city of New York, which he may have left in the hands of a foreman, and one of the subordinate clerks may be guilty of embezzlement. Now, would you not say he would be a hard master if he should go to that foreman and say, pay me the money that my dishonest clerk stole?

Mr. SPARKS. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKS. You said it is better for the Government to lose where the officer is not in default, but at the same time the Government has not been in default?

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the point I tried to make. I said the Government was not in default, and if not provided for in the law now the law-making power should provide hereafter that every man charged with the handling of the Government money should be compelled to give a bond and to be responsible for the funds placed in his hands, so we should not hold the chief officer responsible and require him to give bond for the honesty of a vast number of subordinates, over whom he could exercise no control beyond ordinary diligence.

Why, we relieved the Treasurer of the United States (Mr. Spinner) in a case not much different from this, and I believe there was no objection to it. He had thirty or forty thousand dollars stolen from the Treasury when he held the office of Treasurer of the United States, and without any opposition, as I understand, Congress relieved him from that loss.

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] supplies the fact that I could not remember, namely, as to the amount of the sum for which we relieved Ex-Treasurer Spinner—$61,000. That is the sum which Congress voted to Mr. Spinner to make good his loss. And what were the circumstances? It was an ordinary burglary committed on the Treasury Department of the United States by which this amount of money was stolen from the Government of the United States; and Mr. Spinner was as much responsible for the loss of that $61,000 as Mr. Eyster is responsible for the loss of $800 in this case.

Mr. REAGAN. But Mr. Spinner did not trust the man with the money which he stole.

Mr. SPRINGER. It might have been urged that Mr. Spinner ought to have had the door locked when the thief was coming, or that he ought to have had a faithful person on guard, and that he did not take those precautions. But we all believed Mr. Spinner exercised the reasonable diligence which a public officer should exercise who has custody of public funds, and for that reason Congress relieved him of the responsibility. If Mr. Eyster had not exercised the ordinary diligence of a public officer, and had by any negligence allowed this money to be stolen or embezzled by a dishonest clerk, I would hold him to his bond. But I hold that where, as in this case, an officer has established by a long term of service a reputation for honesty, during a long management of the public funds, it is unjust to hold such a public officer responsible in a case of this kind, and he ought to be relieved. If he were guilty of the slightest neglect I would not relieve him, but would hold him to the hard conditions of his bond, which I think are hard in this case and in every similar case where we seek to hold officers responsible.

Mr. BROWNE. The other day I opposed the granting of relief to the assistant treasurer of the United States at New Orleans because I believed that in that case the report of the committee did not show that the officer was free from fault. If I comprehend the report of the committee in this case, it is that the loss occurred in consequence of the dishonesty of a clerk over whose appointment the officer had no control. The clerk was put there by the Government, and its officer had no authority under the law to exact from him a bond of indemnity. I have always believed that where the loss of the public funds was occasioned by an inevitable accident the officer ought to be relieved. If the Treasury, as in the case referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] was robbed by a burglar, without fault on the part of the Treasurer of the United States, there was certainly no impropriety in Congress giving relief.

Now, I cannot see any difference in principle between the case where a burglar from the outside enters through the door in the nighttime, breaks open the money-chests and abstracts the money, and the case where the Government itself puts the thief in a position where he can take the money. It appears that a person was put there purposely by the Government, who turns out to be a thief; he is put by the Government in custody of the bonds, and is thus given the opportunity of committing the theft. If it be true, as is reported by the committee in this case, and I take it to be so, that the Government of the United States puts a clerk into the Treasury without the consent of the officer having charge of the funds, at least it assumes the right and authority of placing him there, and if, after the Government puts him there, giving him the opportunity, he commits the larceny, I think the officer ought to be relieved. But if it turns out to be true that the clerk is of the officer's own election, or if it turns out to be true that the officer might under the law indemnify himself by requiring a bond and has failed to do so, in either of these cases the loss ought to be made good. It is negligence on the part of an officer intrusted with a public fund to take into his employment a person having in any measure the control of it, and not to require from him a bond where, under the law, he had the right to exact one. That is a negligence, and in such a case he ought not to be relieved from its consequences. I think it would be an exceedingly unsafe and hazardous precedent to give the treasurer or other custodian of the public funds the authority to appoint a clerk, and if he exercises that right and makes the appointment of a clerk or other agent who turns out to be dishonest, for the Government, in that case, to give the officer relief. For there he exercises the power of selection, and I apprehend whether there be any statute on the subject directing or allowing it to be done or not, under the common law, under the recognized law of the country, under such circumstance, he would have the right to exact from his employé an obligation with security indemnifying him against any loss either by negligence or by dishonesty.

I shall always vote against giving relief in either of the cases I have mentioned, either where the dishonest employé is of the officer's own selection, or where under the law he has the right to exact from the employé a bond and fails to do so. But in the case where the Government exercises the authority to appoint, and puts into another's employment a clerk or other custodian of the funds, it makes him the bailee; he is the Government's agent. If the Government puts a clerk there and he turns out to be a thief, after the principal has exercised proper discretion and reasonable diligence, in all such cases I shall vote, and vote cheerfully, to relieve the officer.

Mr. SPARKS. I think this case goes further in this direction than any case that has ever before been brought before this House. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] has most clearly presented it. The clerk of the assistant treasurer of the United States at Philadelphia abstracted $800 of the money of the Government then and there in the custody of that officer. Of course, the assistant treasurer had to account for and make good the money so lost.

Now, this officer by this bill desires to be relieved of this loss and have that amount refunded to him, upon the ground that he himself was not in default, but that a clerk in his office was the thief. Why, sir, that case is just as broad as the claim of a banker would be in whose bank I may have deposited my money, and from which his clerk has stolen it, when he (the banker) should ask me to relieve him from the payment of that money which I deposited in his hands for the reason that it has been stolen by his clerk. I can see no difference.

Do any of these gentlemen here insinuate that these assistant treasurers of the United States have clerks forced upon them? I know that is not so. They have the control of their own clerks, and are responsible for the acts of their clerks, or else there can be no safety to the public. I state that to be the fact. No authority of the Government is exercised in the appointment of clerks for assistant treasurers.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] permit me a moment?

Mr. SPARKS. Certainly.

Mr. BROWNE. I want that question made clear. I understood from the statement of the gentleman who has charge of this bill [Mr. DUNNELL] that in this instance the Government exercised the right or the power of appointing the subordinate of this assistant treasurer——

Mr. SPARKS. That is a mistake.

Mr. BROWNE. And that in consequence of the dishonesty of this subordinate so appointed by the Government this money was lost.

Mr. SPARKS. I will explain that. In this case, as shown by the report of the committee, the assistant treasurer found this clerk in office, and he continued him there by making him his own officer. Gentlemen will also perceive that in this particular case this assistant treasurer himself promoted this man. He not only kept him in the position he found him in, and from which, when he went into office, he had the right to remove him and put in his place his own confidential agent, but he promoted him.

Mr. MORSE. Had he the right to remove that man without the consent of the Government?

Mr. SPARKS. Unquestionably he had the right to remove him.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let me correct the gentleman. This man was in the office of the assistant treasurer.

Mr. SPARKS. Yes.

Mr. DUNNELL. Confirmed in that position by the Treasury Department. He was not there by virtue of an appointment made by the assistant treasurer.

Mr. SPARKS. By whom was he appointed?

Mr. DUNNELL. By the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SPARKS. These clerks are not appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DUNNELL. This clerk was there, having been nominated by the assistant treasurer and confirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury. He was in office with a good record up to the time that this assistant treasurer took the office, and he continued in the discharge of the duties of his position, this assistant treasurer keeping the man who had previously a good record.

Mr. SPARKS. I cannot yield to all this interruption. If the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] states that these clerks are not appointees of the assistant treasurers and controlled by them, then I am either in error or he is; that is a square issue.

Now, I say that the clerks of assistant treasurers are appointed by and belong to them, so far as the power of controlling them is concerned. No clerk can be kept in the office of an assistant treasurer, in opposition to the wishes of that officer. That is my statement, and it makes a square issue. Does the gentleman say to the contrary?

The assistant treasurer has the power to appoint his clerks. It may be necessary for him to receive some confirmation from the Secretary of the Treasury. But he is the clerk of the assistant treasurer, and when that officer goes into office he has the power to clean out all of the clerks at once, and appoint such clerks as he may choose to enable him to discharge the duties of the office for which he is responsible to the Government. That is the rule and the law.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. SPARKS. Certainly.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will ask the gentleman if he had been put into this office as Mr. Eyster was, and had been told by his predecessor, the outgoing assistant treasurer, that there was a clerk there who had been in the office for a number of years, who had a perfectly good record, would the gentleman accepting so important an office as that have "cleaned out" that clerk without any earthly evidence against him?

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman asks me a fair question and now I will answer it as fairly. Yes, sir; if I am appointed to an office involving the custody of millions of the public money, I will select men that I myself know to be honest and reliable to assist me in the discharge of the duties of that office, and not take or keep men of whom I know nothing except from the recommendation of others.

Now, I want to state to the gentleman another fact, that there is no really careful assistant treasurer in the United States who does not do that. I have had some practical experience on that subject. I was once myself a land office receiver, and thereby became acquainted with these matters. I know that of the assistant treasurers with whom I have had business relations, not one of them ever dreamed of going into office and being compelled to keep the clerks who were there under their predecessors. Does it stand to reason that they would do it? Does it not stand to reason that a man having charge of millions of the public money would insist upon selecting that class of confidential agents that they knew well and in whom they had full confidence, to assist them in taking care of and properly controlling such large money interests as are committed to their charge? I take it that such is the fact, the rule, and the law.

It is true that when a man comes into office and finds a clerk there he may, if the clerk is satisfactory and sufficiently recommended to him by his predecessor, retain him; but he must stand the consequences. It then becomes his own appointment, and by retaining him he makes him his own officer. In such case to insist that the assistant treasurer should be relieved because his own agent and confidential clerk thus selected should abstract and steal the people's money is, it seems to me, to open a very wide door to peculation and fraud.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it not a fact also that large salaries are given to these officers in order to compensate them for every possible loss of this kind?

Mr. SPARKS. I suppose the salary is graded according to the responsibility incurred as well as the labor to be done.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And every time we attempt to reduce the salary of one of these officers, is not the hue and cry raised that his responsibility is so great?

Mr. DUNNELL. This officer during his official term has handled hundreds of millions of dollars without one cent of deficiency other than this. The salary paid him was $4,500 a year.

A MEMBER. What was his bond?

Mr. DUNNELL. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SPARKS. The bonds in all these cases are, as they ought to be, large, and the responsibility of the bondsmen carefully scrutinized.

Mr. DUNNELL. A clerk whose dishonesty was not developed until after his appointment, and could not be foreseen by his principal, takes out half a dollar at a time from this bag and that, making altogether $882.50. There were over $6,000,000 counted on that very day.

Mr. SPARKS. We are not questioning that this money was stolen. We take it for granted that the committee has reported the facts—that this amount of money in the assistant treasurer's office was abstracted by his clerk, the money being in the custody of the assistant treasurer and he being responsible for the acts of his clerk as a banker would be accountable for the acts of his clerk.

Now, what was the Spinner case which my colleague has alluded to? In that case the loss was occasioned by a burglary. The office of the Treasurer was entered by burglars, and the money stolen by them. Therefore General Spinner could come to Congress with some show of reason and ask reimbursement for the money which had thus been taken, not by any act of his or of any agent for whom he was responsible, but by thieves for whom he certainly was not responsible who entered the office and stole it.

We have had some other cases of that sort, and they present grave questions. It is not every case of that kind, by any means, in which I would approve of reimbursement. I hold to the doctrine presented by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] that these officers should be held to a rigid account for every dollar coming into their hands, unless lost by means wherein there is no fault on their part and where the Government is clearly in default. In the case of General Spinner the Government may have been in default. Perhaps it was incumbent on the Government to provide a safe or a building so strong that burglars could not enter it. Perhaps, therefore, in cases of that kind relief ought to be granted. It strikes me, however, as a correct general principle that the officer should be held responsible for all losses except where the Government is very clearly in default.

Let me give an illustration. Suppose the Government funds are being conveyed by an agent from point to point under an escort furnished by the Government; the escort is overpowered or proves unfaithful; and we will further suppose that it was a part of the contract entering into the relation of custodian that the escort should be furnished by the Government; in cases of that kind I should think the Government ought to suffer the loss or refund the money; but in no case should it do so where there has been no default on the part of the Government. In cases like this now before the House, where there has been simply a loss of money through the larceny of an agent selected by the officer asking to be reimbursed, a clerk indorsed and promoted by the assistant treasurer himself, it certainly is not incumbent upon nor will it do for Congress to refund the money and thereby reimburse the officer for such loss.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I was not disposed to take part in this discussion. I had made up my mind to support the bill, and in doing so follow the unanimous report made by the Committee of Ways and Means. Having found that in the last Congress Mr. Robbins, of North Carolina, then a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report similar in effect and purpose, recommending the repayment of this money, and also that in the Forty-fourth Congress Governor Thomas, of Maryland, then a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report recommending the passage of such a bill, I had determined to vote in accordance with those reports.

I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] that the case to which he has referred, that of General Francis E. Spinner, for many years Treasurer of the United States, was in many respects exactly similar to this. The bill which we passed reimbursed him for a number of items. The largest of those items was for a loss occasioned by burglary; but the same section of the law, to which I ask the attention of the committee, and approved March 3, 1873, contains, as the gentleman will find, several allowances for embezzlement by dishonest clerks and employés. The section is as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $61,174.52, lawful money, be, and it hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse Francis E. Spinner for losses incurred in his office as Treasurer of the United States, through embezzlement on the part of employés and otherwise, without negligence or fault on his part, namely: Loss by the embezzlement of Seth Johnson, late interest-teller, $37,894.20; loss by the embezzlement of F. A. Marden, late chief of division of accounts, $11,413.97; part of a package of new notes stolen from the division of issues, $11,500; amount found short in an actual count of $131,000, specimen currency, $71.77; amount found short in an actual count of the paying teller's cash, twenty cents; amount found short in an actual count of a package of new notes, $1; amount found short in an actual count of a package of new notes, temporarily made good by the original counter, $20; amount found short in an actual count of the funds of the redemption division, $131.37; amount found short in an actual count of the funds of the cash division, $142.01; in all, $61,174.52.

I do not think that in this Congress or in any other we shall establish a principle which will forbid reimbursement of a public officer for losses occasioned by the dishonesty of a clerk.

There are upon the statute-book plenty of precedents made by former Congresses for the passage of a bill of this kind. The case of the assistant treasurer at New York, Mr. Hillhouse, was very similar to this. In that case a large amount of money—thousands of dollars—had been embezzled by a dishonest clerk, as is recited in the act itself, which is as follows:

An act for the relief of Thomas Hillhouse, assistant treasurer of the United States in New York City.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the proper accounting officers be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to allow Thomas Hillhouse, assistant treasurer of the United States at New York City, in the settlement of his internal-revenue stamp account, a credit for the sum of $185,000, being the proceeds of sale of internal-revenue stamps embezzled by James I. Johnson, a clerk in his office, without the default or negligence of said assistant treasurer.

Approved March 5, 1874.

Here is also an act passed by Congress and approved by the President which is a precedent for this kind of remedial legislation:

An act for the relief of Captain Charles McClure.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the proper accounting officers, in settling and adjusting the accounts of Charles McClure, captain and commissary of subsistence, United States Army, are hereby directed to credit said McClure with the sum of $844.63, on account of loss of that amount in 1869 and 1870, by the embezzlement of a clerk in his employ, the amount being lost without neglect or fault of said McClure.

Approved March 3, 1873.

There are also other cases where relief has been given in like manner to make good the embezzlement of subordinates; for instance, in the case of the cashier of William B. Thomas, formerly collector of the port of Philadelphia, and also in the case of the embezzlement by a subordinate under John L. Thomas, collector of the port of Baltimore. I might go on multiplying precedents.

A gentleman appointed to a responsible position like that of United States assistant treasurer, upon entering his office finds employed there a body of clerks who are recommended to him by his predecessor as honest and capable of performing all their duties. Naturally he retains those clerks. Especially in such institutions as the subtreasuries of the United States it is a very delicate thing, indeed, to remove a man from a position if he has been correct in his dealings as an official.

And besides, Mr. Chairman, according to the theory of the gentleman from Illinois you might as well argue that the Secretary of the Treasury should be chargeable with such losses, for he at last is the one who really appoints the clerks in the office of the assistant treasurer at Philadelphia, or the office of the assistant treasurer at Boston or elsewhere, as the case may be. Those assistant treasurers cannot make any appointment without first submitting it to the Secretary of the Treasury, and before any subordinate is really and absolutely in his position his nomination must be confirmed by the act of the Secretary of the Treasury. So in all positions subject to duty under the Treasury Department.

One word further in this matter. I hold in this very instance, as I read this report, and as I happen to know personally from Mr. Eyster, a gentleman of great integrity of character, extremely careful in all his acts, and vigilant, that it was prudence and care on his part which at last discovered this loss of eight or nine hundred dollars through this subordinate. Under the law establishing the mints in the United States in 1872 or 1873 the Secretary of the Treasury ordered all the assistant treasurers at the various sub-treasuries in the country and all the superintendents of mints of the United States to have a recount of bullion. The law almost required it to be done. This count was made under the supervision of careful officers in Assistant Treasurer Eyster's office. As they were coming to the close in reference to the bullion, which under the order of the Secretary they were obliged to count, it was because of the extreme care on the part of Mr. Eyster and his cashier that this error of $800 or so was discovered. I say it was the vigilance and watchful care of this officer which brought this loss to light.

Now, what did he do? As soon as he discovered this amount in default which had been embezzled by this man Bond he discharged him. Mr. Eyster had been in office two or three years. Bond had held over, coming to him highly recommended by his predecessor, and he promoted him, I suppose, because he found in him ability in the discharge of his business and, as was supposed, integrity. But that, sir, does not argue against the treasurer as being wanting in diligence. As soon as he discovered this man had done wrong he discharged him. Subsequently, as appears by the report, Mr. Eyster paid the amount of the loss into the Treasury of the United States.

I think, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, taking these three reports from three distinct Committees of Ways and Means of this House, this Congress, from that fact alone, would be perfectly justified in passing this bill. I hope the bill will be passed. It is but just to a highly meritorious official.

Mr. FINLEY. I have no doubt from the fact stated by the report of the committee they were justifiable in coming to the conclusion they did, that the man who took this money without authority was a thief. I think the facts fully carry out the committee in coming to the conclusion that the man who stole the money was a thief. Gentlemen, however, insist we should make good this money to Mr. Eyster because they claim he himself was guilty of no want of care in permitting nearly a thousand dollars to be stolen from him. Of course Mr. Eyster showed a great deal of diligence in locking the stable after the horse was stolen. My opinion of the matter is that if he had exhibited one-half of the diligence before that he did afterward, we would not be called upon here to make good a thousand dollars stolen from his possession. There is sufficient on the face of this report to show that Mr. Eyster has been guilty of negligence in this matter, and it is setting a bad precedent for Congress to refund this money which was stolen from Mr. Eyster by an employé of his own appointment.

Mr. KELLEY. That is a mistake; he found him in office when he came to it.

Mr. FINLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The report reads he found him there when he came there.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. As soon as he assumed the duties of the office, if he continued in office the clerks and employés, they at once became his. He certainly had the right to remove them. If he confirmed the appointments he found there, then they became his by virtue of that confirmation. If he, furthermore, promoted this man to a higher office, then undoubtedly he became his.

Now, then, the agent of this man steals a thousand dollars from the Government. The committee say he stole it. The committee say it was the act of a thief; and yet I find in the report here that the district attorney gave the opinion that the thief this man had appointed and promoted could not be prosecuted under the law for larceny. It is the first time in my experience that I ever heard that a thief could not be prosecuted for larceny if the proof could be made against him, and to this day that man's agent has not been prosecuted but is at large.

But was it not negligence in Mr. Eyster to permit his own agent to take from these bags money day by day in small sums without ever counting the bags? As the committee report, it is a loss which would have been detected, or ought to have been detected, by the use of proper diligence. Now, then, was it not negligence on his part not to make the discovery; not to know that his clerk was abstracting the money?

But his negligence did not stop here, for it appears on reading this report that after it was discovered that Mr. Bond, this agent or clerk, had abstracted this money, for it appears that it was stolen, Mr. Eyster did not go to work to count the money on hand in those bags; but it appears he simply counted the bags which bore the mark of Mr. Bond, the defaulting employé. For all we know another dishonest clerk or agent may turn up when he counts the other bags, and that some other agent or dishonest clerk has abstracted a thousand or two thousand dollars, and we would have Mr. Eyster coming here again asking that he shall be reimbursed for that loss. Now, that was the duty of Mr. Eyster, and he ought to be held responsible for the honesty of his clerk, and the honest keeping of the money intrusted to his care.

Gentlemen say that his salary is so low and his bond is so large that this would work a great hardship. My answer to that is, if he cannot employ clerks in whom he has full confidence, and with whom he is willing to intrust the money on a small salary and a large bond, all he has to do is to resign, and they will find somebody else who will take care of it and perform the service. He is not bound to remain, and I believe it is setting a bad precedent to make good to any officer the losses sustained by the dishonest act of his clerk, for whose honesty he is accountable. If this loss had occurred in consequence of a fire or of a burglary, or of some casualty over which he had no control and could not prevent, it would raise an entirely different question. But here we have his own servant, his own agent, the person he both appointed and promoted, abstracting this money, and I think it would be unjust and improper to reimburse him for this loss. I think he should be held responsible.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee of Ways and Means have three times investigated this case. Three different Committees of Ways and Means have examined it, and have always arrived at the same conclusion, that Mr. Eyster had not been guilty of negligence, or in any way been derelict in his duty.

What were the circumstances of the appointment of this dishonest clerk? It had been made by Mr. Eyster's predecessor. The clerk was a man who had borne uniformly through life a good character and enjoyed the confidence of his employers and of the community. He was not subject to removal by Mr. Eyster, as he could not have been appointed by Mr. Eyster. The assistant treasurer may nominate a clerk when there is a vacancy, but the Department at Washington confirms it. He is a clerk of the Department, and can only be removed by the Department on cause shown.

Now, Mr. Eyster's first suspicion arose from the discovery of this peculation, and as soon as suspicion was created he took immediate action for the removal of the man and for his punishment. There is no possible degree of negligence chargeable to him. The case comes again within the line, a long line, of precedents in which men have been reimbursed under similar circumstances.

Mr. HUTCHINS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Is there any case where money has been paid into the Treasury by a defaulting officer, and appropriation has been made by Congress to pay it out again? Have there not been cases where the parties have settled with the Government and paid the money into the Treasury?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not hear the gentleman's question distinctly.

Mr. HUTCHINS. What I desire to know is this: Is there any precedent, where the money has been paid by the defaulting officer into the Treasury, that an appropriation has been made by Congress to reimburse and return it to the party by whom it was paid?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir; if I understand the gentleman's question——

Mr. HUTCHINS. Will the gentleman cite an instance?

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot reply immediately from memory. I know that there have been such cases.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The Spinner case is not such a case, neither is the Hillhouse case, which has been alluded to here.

Mr. KELLEY. My colleague hands me a paper, in which I find the following bill for the relief of Mr. Spinner:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $61,174.52, lawful money, be, and it hereby is, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse Francis E. Spinner for losses incurred in his office as Treasurer of the United States, through embezzlement on the part of employés and otherwise, without negligence or fault on his part, namely: loss by the embezzlement of Seth Johnson, late interest teller, $37,894.20; loss by the embezzlement of F. A. Marden, late chief of division of accounts, $11,413.97; part of a package of new notes stolen from the division of issues, $11,500; amount found short in an actual count of $131,000, specimen currency, $71.77; amount found short in an actual count of the paying teller's cash, twenty cents; amount found short in an actual count of a package of new notes, $1; amount found short in an actual count of a package of new notes, temporarily made good by the original counter, $20; amount found short in an actual count of the funds of the redemption division, $131.37; amount found short in an actual count of the funds of the cash division, $142.01; in all, $61,174.52.

Approved March 3, 1873.

There is another act, which became law on the 1st of March last:

An act for the relief of Albert U. Wyman, late Treasurer of the United States.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Albert U. Wyman, late Treasurer of the United States, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,351.70, to reimburse said Wyman for two bonds of the United States known as "sixes of 1881," of the denomination of $1,000 each, and coupons thereon, purchased by him to replace two bonds of like issue and amount, the property of the First National Bank of Newport, Rhode Island, lost or abstracted from the vault of the national-bank division while Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Now, if the gentleman will allow me, I will ask him whether General Spinner paid that money into the Treasury or whether it was simply a charge upon the books of the Treasury against him, and he could have no relief until that bill was passed?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not know how that fact is; but I know that equity is equity, and that it is no less equity if a man, finding himself for the time being indebted, hands the money to the Government, that it shall not be out of interest or suffer derangement in its accounts, and then comes to it expressing his confidence in his own Government that it will do by him as it has invariably done by other faithful officers who have not been guilty of negligence or malfeasance; and that is the case of Mr. Eyster. A clerk appointed by the Treasury, who served under him, despoiled the Treasury, and he made his accounts good; and he now comes and asks his Government to reimburse him for the crime of a Treasury clerk, over whom he had no control, although he had supervision. That clerk is liable to indictment, and for aught I know has been indicted and punished; and yet you say the law makes him indictable, but we will inflict the pecuniary penalty upon a man who could not have prevented the crime.

Mr. REAGAN. The report shows he could not be indicted.

Mr. KELLEY. I hold in my hand a case of the Supreme Court in which it is held that such clerks may be indicted. It is the case of the United States against Hartwell, page 385 of 6 Wallace.

Mr. FRYE. If the gentleman will allow me I will state that that case goes to the extent of holding that this cashier was the disbursing officer of the Government; that he was not a clerk of the subtreasurer. And you would adopt the doctrine here to-day, or it is urged by gentlemen on the other side, that the Government shall hold the assistant treasurer responsible for the stealings of a man whom the United States courts determine was the disbursing agent of his own Government. I say it is an outrage upon justice or equity.

Mr. KELLEY. I have said all I had to say on the question.

Mr. MILLS. One would suppose, from the arguments which have been made, that every head of a Department in this Government was an insurer against all losses incurred in that Department by the acts of subordinates. Have gentlemen considered just exactly where this leads? The Secretary of the Treasury, for instance, is required by law to appoint so many clerks; the Postmaster-General so many; all these Departments are required to have so many clerks; so many of one class, so many of another. Is it intended by these gentlemen that the Secretary of the Treasury is responsible for any defalcations that may occur by any one of the five hundred or one thousand clerks who have been appointed by him? He is compelled by law to make these appointments; he cannot escape making these appointments; and he has to take his chance in making his selection, as every other man has to do, of selecting as best he can honest and capable men.

To say that a salary of $5,000 or $6,000 is a sufficient guarantee against a liability for losses of perhaps half a million of dollars is simply an absurdity on its face. What man of pecuniary responsibility would accept the office of Secretary of the Treasury, or that of any other head of a Department with a salary of $8,000, and be responsible for the loss of $10,000,000? It is simply to offer a premium for rascality to establish such a precedent. It is simply to issue an interdiction against men of pecuniary responsibility from filling such offices. It is to farm out the offices to soldiers of fortune, as one high court has declared.

That is the argument that is made in the interest of economy here, that heads of Departments in this Government are to be responsible for the thousands of subordinates under them whom they are compelled to appoint by the authority of law. They cannot help it; they cannot evade it. And the argument is still carried further, and it is said that the heads of Departments are responsible for subordinates that they neither have appointed nor have power to remove. And we are asked for precedents for this thing. Why, sir, if there be no precedent, and it is right, let us make one; if there are a thousand precedents, and it is wrong, let us disregard them.

The question at last turns upon this: Is the officer responsible for the peculations and frauds of a subordinate whom he was compelled to appoint under a law which he could not help obeying? and is his little salary of $4,500 given to him by this Government to cover as with insurance a possible loss of a million of dollars?

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is his bond that covers that.

Mr. MILLS. The only liability that the law fixes upon the superior officer is to exercise ordinary diligence. If he has not been guilty of any neglect, if he has not disregarded his own duty to the Government, he is not responsible in the eyes of the law, in the eyes of the Government, or in the eyes of any honest man for the loss of subordinates under him. And for Congress to establish the precedent that every man taking a position as head of one of the Departments of this Government opens a policy of insurance over the defalcations of the thousands of subordinates he may appoint, is simply to issue a proclamation to all men of peculiar responsibility that they are prohibited from taking such positions.

The question was taken upon laying the bill aside, to be reported favorably to the House; and upon a division it was agreed to—ayes 95, noes 39.

REFUNDING OF TAXES ON MANUFACTURED TOBACCO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2797) for the relief of certain citizens of Lynchburgh, Virginia, and refunding to them taxes improperly collected from them on manufactured tobacco; reported from the Committee of Ways and Means by Mr. PHELPS.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the following enumerated citizens or firms of Lynchburgh, Virginia, or to their legal representatives, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, respectively, namely:

To C. Ford, jr., & Son, the sum of $7,534.75;
To John T. Smith & Co., the sum of $2,512.53;
To Winfree & Allen, the sum of $1,117.70;
To John H. Smith & Co., the sum of $1,834.60;
To F. M. Dunnington & Co., the sum of $1,819.54;
To Ferguson & Chambers, the sum of $4,093;
To Hancock & Moorman, the sum of $2,478.93;
To William D. Miller, the sum of $1,193.60;
To Robert Mays, the sum of $3,252.50;
To Tanner & Asher, the sum of $309.45;

In full satisfaction of their claims for internal-revenue taxes improperly collected of them on manufactured tobacco.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the petition of C. Ford, jr., and others, with an accompanying draft of a bill (H. R. 2797) for the relief of sundry citizens of Lynchburgh, Virginia, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The persons asking to be relieved in this case are C. Ford, jr., and others. In the year 1868, and for some time prior thereto, they were manufacturers of plug-tobacco in Lynchburgh, and in the months of March and May in that year sold at the current rates in that market, through Younger & Co., commission agents, to M. Seisfield, then a resident merchant there, and generally reputed and believed to be a man of responsibility and integrity, 103,306 pounds of tobacco, manufactured by themselves. The United States internal-revenue tax on the tobacco was forty cents a pound, amounting on the quantity sold to $41,322.40.

By the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States then in force, the manufacturers were liable to pay the tax, but a custom prevailed in that market, more or less general and uniform, by which the manufacturer, with the assent of the United States assessor, and under a written permit from him, sold and delivered his stock subject to the United States tax, with an agreement with the purchaser that he should pay it, a difference in the price being made in his favor equivalent to the amount of the tax. Such an arrangement, sale, and delivery were made by these parties, the purchaser having paid cash for the tobacco, less the amount of the tax.

Under this arrangement, to which the United States assessor was thus a party, the tobacco was assessed as the property of Seisfield, and the lists made against him, and duly receipted for by the United States collector, and in the month of August, before the tax was collected, he shipped the tobacco and absconded.

The collector, therefore, demanded the tax from the manufacturers, and upon their refusal to pay, distrained and took possession of their establishments and had advertised the same for sale, when the proprietors, in August, 1869, to avoid the sacrifice of their property and the destruction of their business, consented to a compromise and paid the collector $26,196.60, in the following several sums, and were discharged by the Government:

William D. Miller	$1,193 60
C. Ford, jr., & Son	7,584 75
John T. Smith & Co	2,512 53
Winfree & Allen	1,117 70
John H. Smith & Co	1,834 60
F. M. Dunnington	1,819 54
Ferguson & Chambers	4,093 00
Hancock & Moorman	2,478 93
Robert Mays	3,252 50
Tanner & Asher	309 45
	26,196 60

From the fact that the parties acted in good faith, in pursuance of a local practice, and with the assent and under a written permit from the United States internal-revenue assessor for that district, by whom it was understood that the tax should be assessed against and collected from Seisfield, and as the amount of the tax was deducted from the price of the tobacco under that arrangement, the committee think they are entitled to relief, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. PHELPS. The parties which it is proposed to relieve by this bill are respectable citizens of Lynchburgh, Virginia, who, in the prosecution of their legitimate business, have paid as taxes into the Treasury of the United States more than $5,350,000. The transaction by which they disposed of the tobacco referred to in the report was made in pursuance of a local custom prevailing at that place, and which had the sanction of the United States revenue officer, given in a written permit issued by the proper officer. Without his sanction and without his permission the transaction would not have been made, and these parties would not have parted with the possession of their property.

The material facts in this case are all set out in the report, and they establish incontestably the equity of the claim presented by these parties. The Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress unanimously reported this bill, and that committee of the present Congress also report it with nearly the same unanimity. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. CONGER. This is a case where those who were in duty bound to pay taxes to the Government did not pay them until they were compelled to do so by the enforcement of the law. The only excuse they now give for asking that this money be paid back to them is that they by some process instituted a custom unknown to the law, contrary to the law, and in contravention of the law, whereby the purchasers of this tobacco were understood to agree to pay the taxes upon it. Now, that did not relieve them in law from the duty of paying the tax; they could not relieve themselves from that duty by any such agreement.

The revenue officer had no right whatever, under any law of the United States, to permit such a custom by which the Government could be deprived of this tax. It is said that this tobacco was sold to purchasers who, by the custom then in force, were understood, among these parties and by some officers of the Government, to be the parties who would pay the tax; and, having obtained possession of the property, these purchasers went away without paying the tax, or failed in business and were unable to pay it. That is the case, if I understand it aright.

This is a bill for the relief of I do not know how many persons—ten, fifteen, twenty; I do not know but more—all embraced in one bill, without any regard to the peculiar circumstances of each case. We are asked to vote back to them the taxes paid by them under the law, because the purchasers of their property failed in business or went away. I have to say that if we establish such a precedent as that we will call around us a swarm of men almost innumerable, who could just as properly and just as honestly ask the Government to pay back to them taxes which they ought to have paid and which they did pay, and which they ask to have restored to them, simply because they, in common with some officers of the Government, originated a custom contrary to law. It is a proposition to pay a premium to encourage an officer to assent to propositions made by taxpayers which will relieve them from the responsibilities of paying the taxes imposed by law, and will compel the Government to look to those who are under the law not at all liable for the payment of the tax.

In the Committee of Ways and Means I, in common with other members of the committee, disagreed from the conclusions to which the majority arrived, and opposed the making a favorable report upon this bill. I opposed it there as I oppose it here. I can see no good reason why such a precedent should be established. I object to this bill, in addition, because it couples together a large number of persons who have individual claims, each standing upon its own merits.

Mr. PHELPS. It was but a single transaction.

Mr. CONGER. These claims may have arisen out of the same set of transactions, but the sales to the person with whom the supposed agreement was made were all separate sales, made at different times and under different circumstances. It is because of the very fact that they are coupled together and attempted to be passed together, because they refer to the same subject-matter, because they relate to sales of tobacco by these different persons to one individual who failed to pay the tax, that I object to the bill. That in itself is a serious objection to the passage of the bill; that in itself would make the passage of this bill a dangerous precedent; it would invite the people of a whole community, of a whole parish or county, of a whole State, to come together to Congress and ask for such relief.

Now, if the Treasury of the United States is so full that we can go back for years and pay out of it the money which has been collected for taxes according to law, paid by those who may or may not have properly influenced an officer of the Government, it would be well that it should be known and understood. It would be well that it should be known and understood that the more men having somewhat similar claims who can be associated together in a bill the better can they procure their rights, as they call them, or the better procure this relief from the Government, than if they should present their individual claims separately.

I do not see the necessity of hurrying through this class of bills. We sit here for months with men knocking at the doors of this Chamber for their pay as public officers. The marshals of the United States have performed their duties and paid the expenses of the Government of the United States out of their own pockets, and they are unpaid. We cannot get reports on that subject; we cannot have an opportunity for action. But if somebody who was bound to pay a tax under the law has paid it, and there can be presented any flimsy excuse whatever for reaching our hands into the Treasury and taking money to make repayment where taxes have been paid according to law, such a case receives early hearing and is rushed through.

There is a responsibility upon this House to pay, first, the known and acknowledged indebtedness to public servants who have not only given their time to the public service, but have paid the expenses of this Government out of their own pockets for almost a year. It is time that their cases should be heard. When we have paid this indebtedness of the country, it will be time enough to consider whether we can be liberal enough to refund taxes properly assessed, properly demanded, and properly paid—taxes which, if refunded, the Government has no legal right to receive from any other source whatever.

Let gentlemen tell us why we should be in such hot haste to draw money from the Treasury to refund taxes which were properly paid under the law, while we are refusing from month to month to hear the demands of our own officers who have been left without fees and who are simply asking restoration of the money that they have paid on behalf of the Government. If any one will tell me why the Government in this case should lose its taxes, if any one will tell me why a man who, by some collusion perhaps with an officer of the Government, threw off upon another individual the responsibility of paying taxes which the law did not assess upon him, and the payment of which the Government cannot enforce against him, then I may cease my opposition to this bill.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I beg the attention of the committee for a few moments, while I state this case with all fairness and candor.

In the year 1868, before stamps were required to be placed upon packages of tobacco sold by a manufacturer, when taxes were paid upon assessments made by assessors in the different districts, a number of manufacturers in the city of Lynchburgh, in my district, were endeavoring to make a profit by engaging in the manufacture of tobacco. A man named Seisfield, having a large warehouse there, carried on an extensive business as a wholesale dealer in tobacco. It was agreed between the assessor and these parties engaged in the manufacture of tobacco that if they sold their tobacco to Seisfield they might remove it without the payment of tax to the warehouse of Seisfield, to whom the tax would be charged. Hence, in selling their tobacco, these gentlemen deducted from the amount they demanded from Seisfield the tax which was due. In the sale of their tobacco they never received anything for the tax, the assessor saying that it might be charged to Seisfield. The assessor gave a written permit for the removal of the tobacco to Seisfield's warehouse without the payment of tax, which was charged on the books to Seisfield. The taxes were not collected from Seisfield for four or five months, these parties in the mean while going on with their business and furnishing him tobacco. At the end of five months Seisfield absconded; and then the assessor and collector came upon these parties and demanded payment of the tax, levied upon their factories, their residences, their whole property. These men being thus, as it were, held by the throat, everything they possessed in the world being liable to sale, consented, on being let off, to pay $26,000 of the $40,000 charged against them. They were advised to do this by the agent sent down there by the Treasury Department to look into this matter, who reported that they had acted in perfect good faith, and advised them to appeal to Congress for a remission of the tax.

As the gentleman from Michigan has said, in the requirement that these taxes should be paid, there was nothing to which these parties could technically object. The proceeding by which the payment of the tax was to be transferred to Seisfield was no doubt irregular and illegal, though it was not only allowed by the assessor, but approved upon consultation with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue who said, "I do not care what you do about it; all you have to do is to collect the tax." Upon this consent of Government officials the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as well as the assessor—these parties, acting in entire good faith, parted with their property without making any charge for the amount of the tax which they were afterward called upon to pay.

It seems to me that the case stands as if the parties in this case had given to the collector of taxes an order upon Seisfield for the tax; that order is accepted by the collector in payment of the tax; and now not having collected it from the drawee, he comes back on the drawer for tax lost by his own negligence.

Mr. CONGER. If a check is protested it comes back to the drawer for payment. That is the case here, I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. TUCKER. That is not the case here. The payee cannot come back on the drawer unless he has made due presentment of the draft, due demand on the drawee. In this case the demand was not made for five months, and the collector never came back on the drawer until the drawee had absconded. I ask the gentleman whether he thinks it fair for this Government to hold these parties responsible in such a case?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman now comes to what he considers the equities.

Mr. TUCKER. No, sir, the equities are the law of all bills of exchange. This is one of those cases in which, as Lord Mansfield said, the principles of commercial law are as wide as the world; there is no statutory limitation upon them. The law is not one thing in one place and another thing in another. It is universal law, applicable everywhere, that if I give a draft to a man who does not use due diligence in presenting it, and meanwhile the drawee absconds, he cannot come back on me and demand payment.

Mr. CONGER. Why did not they avail themselves of that legal right?

Mr. TUCKER. Because they were then in the position of having all their property exposed for sale with no power to enjoin it, with no power for relief except to come here to the great inquest of the nation.

Mr. REED. I should like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I see in this report it says the stock was delivered subject to the United States tax, with an agreement with the purchaser that he should pay. With whom was that agreement made?

Mr. TUCKER. With the assessor. And I will say now to my friend from Maine, that in the whole testimony—and I know the parties perfectly well—there is not the slightest shadow of imputation on the good faith of these parties, or any purpose on their part to defraud the Government.

Mr. REED. One other question.

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly

Mr. REED. You say the matter was brought to the notice of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and he said he did not care provided the tax was collected?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Was that prior to this arrangement with the assessor?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Now, sir, I was going to say so far from these parties attempting to avoid their liability for any tax, these very men to whom this money ought to be returned paid into the United States in taxes on tobacco since the war over $5,000,000. And that is a city that is paying nearly two millions of internal revenue on tobacco every year. I say, therefore, these gentlemen come here just in this attitude before the House: They say we have been compelled to pay this tax after we have given an order on a man, which the assessor accepted as payee of the tax, to whom we sold the tobacco less the tax, in order that he might pay the tax to the assessor. We ask the Government to say whether it is going to hold this money in its pocket which we paid on this tobacco when it has been taken from us under the circumstances we have shown. I appeal not only to the equity but to the sense of justice of this House. I do hope that this bill will be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Has the gentleman stated what appeared in evidence, that this was not an isolated case but that it was the custom?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir; it was the custom, perfectly well understood in the trade.

Mr. REED. This matter is entirely new to me; but I should like to state to the House the impression it makes on my mind on the statement of facts made by the gentleman from Virginia. It seems that the parties to this transaction knew it was illegal—the parties who participated in it, and who come here for relief.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER. I did not say the parties knew it was illegal. The truth is, at that time of day, in 1868, the people of Virginia knew nothing about the law except as they got it from the collector.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. TUCKER. And when the collector and assessor said this was the law and applied to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue they submitted, and that is all.

Mr. REED. And when they submitted it to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, he said he cared not what arrangement they made provided the Government got the tax. Consequently the parties must have known that they were to be responsible for the payment of the tax; that if they trusted Seisfield under this arrangement they were liable to be called upon by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the tax; and, under these circumstances, it seems to me they must have comprehended that they warranted the payment by Seisfield and this arrangement was made simply for their convenience. If a Government officer, transcending the bounds of his known duty, makes an arrangement merely for the convenience of a party and it is understood that by law all taxes are payable just the same as if no such arrangement was made, I do not see how the party can come here and claim exemption.

And, further than that, I do not see how any government can be carried on upon any such basis. If the United States is to be bound by the acts of its officers in violation of law, we are not having a reign of law but a reign of office-holders. And I submit on the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia it is establishing a dangerous and unpleasant precedent to remit the tax under these circumstances. It was well known that every pound of tobacco was to pay tax, and it was well understood that the taxes were to be paid by the manufacturers at first-hand.

It is claimed now an arrangement has been made including the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and on investigating that arrangement it seems the Commissioner of Internal Revenue consented to it only with the express understanding that at all events and under all circumstances the United States Government was to have the tax. The Government has to a certain extent got the tax. Why should it warrant Mr. Seisfield's honesty for the tax any more than for the price of the tobacco? The tax was a part of the price of the tobacco. If it does not warrant the whole price, why should it warrant any part of the price?

Mr. TUCKER. I do not desire to prolong this debate.

Mr. CONGER. Let me say a word.

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to add to what I have already said that after the statement of the gentleman from Virginia that when this matter came to the attention of the Departments they gave full force to all the equities of the case, and did make such an arrangement that the United States should lose something, one-half of the tax due; made a proposition it seems with those liable for the tax that if they would pay a part, and share the loss with the Government, they would be allowed to go free as to the remainder. The Government, it seems, accepted some $26,000 instead of the forty or fifty thousand, or whatever sum it may have been, and divided with these sufferers, condoned their agreement with an official contrary to law and accepted a portion of this tax, and so settled the matter. Not satisfied with the settlement, which certainly in law and in equity and in good conscience was very favorable to those who owed the tax to the United States, and who were in law bound to pay it, they come now and ignore that settlement and ask that the portion which they did pay shall be restored to them.

If unsatisfied with the Government in yielding so much, let them come here and test the question whether they shall pay all as a matter of law, and as a matter of right. To the supporters of law, uninfluenced by considerations of sympathy for these men, who undoubtedly lost money through the purchase by Seisfield of their tobacco, they would be compelled to refund the other portion to the Treasury of the United States, and thereby save the imposition of additional tax upon the other people of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. It appears, Mr. Chairman, an arrangement was made outside the law, between the officer of the Government, the manufacturers of the tobacco, and the purchaser of that tobacco, and that the purchaser did not act honestly; that he was dishonest by absconding, and that the manufacturers thereby were required to pay the tax upon the tobacco. Now, I do not think the whole people should be held responsible for what these parties have suffered, but that the latter should be bound to protect themselves. We cannot undertake to guarantee the honesty of men who deal in tobacco or anything else.

Mr. TUCKER. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WHITE. Do I understand we are asked to refund money here which was paid by these parties simply as a compromise?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to debate the question?

Mr. TUCKER. The House is dividing. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. WHITE. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order pending a division of the committee.

Mr. WHITE. I rise for information, and I submit that I have a right to do so. I understand this amount of money was paid on a compromise; that the original amount of the tax claimed against this property was forty-one thousand and some odd hundred dollars, and that the property itself was seized, and that then it was compromised for $26,000.

Mr. TUCKER. No, sir. It was not the property which was liable for the tax that was seized. It was their homes, their factories, and their whole business; and while the Government held this property in its possession, then the compromise the gentleman speaks of was made under duress.

Mr. WHITE. Then, I understand the entire amount of the tax originally claimed was $41,000 and it was compromised by the parties who ask relief, for $26,000; and now they ask to go back of the compromise, and claim that the Government shall refund the money thus paid.

Mr. TUCKER. I say they ask to go back of a compromise made with the Government under the circumstances of duress to which I have referred, and they appeal to the equity and sense of justice of the Government to refund the tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 88, noes 31.

So (further count not being called for) the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. FINLEY. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MITCHELL reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report two bills with a recommendation that the same be passed.

CHARLES CLINTON.

The SPEAKER. Pending the consideration of the two bills just reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, the unfinished business is the bill (H. R. No. 1542) for the relief of Charles Clinton, of New Orleans, late assistant treasurer at New Orleans, which comes over from a former Friday.

Mr. CARLISLE. The House will remember when this bill was reached as unfinished business on the last consideration day it was passed over that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] might be present at its consideration. It is not my purpose to say anything in addition to what was said while the bill was under consideration except this, that the action of the committee to-day on a bill very similar in its character, and in a case in my judgment not so strong as this, should be sufficient, I think, to induce the House to reverse the action of the committee on this bill and pass it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order. This bill comes over as unfinished business, having on a former Friday been reported adversely by the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CARLISLE. The vote in the committee on this bill was less than a quorum, as shown by the RECORD; while to-day, on a very full vote on the other bill, there was a large majority in its favor. The principle involved in the two bills is substantially the same, and whatever action should be taken on the one I think should be taken on the other. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. McMAHON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana that he should not proceed to-day, when there is not a quorum present.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish merely to call the attention of the House to the facts in this case. But as gentlemen around me desire it, I yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. UPSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 163) authorizing the Secretary of War to expend a sum of money heretofore appropriated for the erection of a storehouse and depot building at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CHITTENDEN, for four days, on account of important business.

The motion of Mr. SPARKS was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 31, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to call the attention of the House to a statement contained in the RECORD of this morning, as follows:

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent that the hour fixed for the delivering of eulogies upon my late colleague from Iowa, Hon. RUSH CLARK, be changed from two o'clock to-morrow until immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

This statement is incorrect, the time which was assigned for the eulogies having been immediately after the morning hour; but it has probably resulted in the absence of a number of members, and it is obvious there is not a quorum present.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that the morning hour be dispensed with and we proceed immediately with the memorial services.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope that consent will not be granted until some purely formal matters are disposed of.

Mr. PRICE. There is evidently not a quorum of the House present, and I will not antagonize the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to report a bill from the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose?

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. For present consideration.

Mr. HAZELTON. I object, unless the same privilege be extended to other gentlemen. There are a number of reports on which many of us desire action.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Will my friend hear the bill read? It simply relieves four men from disabilities which they have incurred in regard to the entry of public lands; that is all there is in the bill.

Mr. HAZELTON. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. It is a perfectly inoffensive bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is it the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. It is.

CYRUS B. INGHAM AND OTHERS.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Public Lands, as a substitute for House bill No. 1231, for the relief of G. A. Wood, and House bill No. 2366, for the relief of Cyrus B. Ingham, a bill (H. R. No. 3992) for the relief of Cyrus B. Ingham, of the Territory of Dakota, Harvey Bryant and Guilford A. Wood, of Kansas, and Richard Parker, of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the right to homestead, pre-emption, and timber-culture entry upon public lands subject thereto is hereby restored to Cyrus B. Ingham, of the Territory of Dakota, Harvey Bryant and Guilford A. Wood, of Kansas, and Richard Parker, of Minnesota, as fully as though they had not heretofore made any one or all of such entries and had abandoned the same, or for any cause they have been unable to perfect their title thereto: Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to enable any of said parties to procure title to land, either as homestead, pre-mption, or timber-culture claim, in excess of what is fixed and provided by law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISPENSING WITH THE MORNING HOUR.

Mr. KNOTT. Has my request been preferred to the House for dispensing with the morning hour to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to yield for propositions that would receive unanimous consent.

Mr. KNOTT. I suppose that these things can come in by unanimous consent, after the House shall have given its assent to my request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House.

The question was taken on dispensing with the morning hour for to-day, and it was agreed to, two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

ELECTION CONTEST—HARALSON VS. SHELLEY.

Mr. KEIFER. I present the memorial of Jere Haralson, of Alabama, praying for a redress of grievances. It relates to his pending contest with Mr. SHELLEY, of Alabama, the sitting member in this House from the fourth congressional district of that State. I ask that the memorial be printed in the usual form and referred to the Committee of Elections. I have spoken to the chairman of that committee in relation to it.

Mr. ACKLEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if that matter has been before the Committee of Elections?

Mr. KEIFER. This memorial has not been before the committee; but the subject-matter of it, the contest, is before the committee.

Mr. SAMFORD. I object.

Mr. KEIFER. I consider it a privileged matter, not coming within the ordinary rules, but a matter which relates to the seat of a member upon this floor, and therefore is not subject to a single objection.

Mr. FINLEY. Let it follow the course of other petitions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that it is not an ordinary petition, but one that relates to the seat of a member on this floor. That removes it from the general class of petitions. A subject-matter which relates to the right of a member to a seat on this floor has usually been regarded as privileged.

Mr. KEIFER. Let it be printed and referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. ACKLEN. In my experience before the Committee of Elections I have observed that all papers are referred to that committee relating to the subject of contests for seats, and such papers as the committee may deem necessary have been ordered to be printed under a general rule to that effect. It does not need any order of the House to have this paper printed. If the Committee of Elections desires to have it printed, it can have it done without any order of the House requiring it. Therefore I do not see the necessity of the gentleman presenting this matter in the House and having an order made by the House to print it, when he can have the same order made by his own committee, for I believe the gentleman is a member of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. KEIFER. It would not come within the rule of the committee at all.

Mr. ACKLEN. I must object to it at present.

The SPEAKER. If it relates to a contest involving the right of a member to a seat in this House, it is a privileged matter.

Mr. ACKLEN. I do not deny the question of privilege, but I believe the gentleman desires to have the paper ordered to be printed; he does not simply ask its reference.

The SPEAKER. If the paper is once before the House a majority can determine the question of printing.

Mr. ACKLEN. It is for the majority to decide whether it shall be printed or not.

Mr. SAMFORD. If it pertains to a contested-election case, is it not proper that it should go to the Committee of Elections?

The SPEAKER. That is what the gentleman asks; and the Committee of Elections will, of course, take cognizance whether it comes within the law or not.

Mr. SAMFORD. I understood that the gentleman desired to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KEIFER. Not at all.

Mr. SAMFORD. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. ACKLEN. I have made no objection to referring the matter to the Committee of Elections. The gentleman asked to have it printed, and I objected to its being printed.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the majority of the House to determine.

Mr. KEIFER. The memorial is long enough to make it important that it should be printed for the convenience of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes it for granted that it is a respectful paper.

Mr. KEIFER. It is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question of printing to the House.

The question was taken upon ordering the memorial to be printed; and upon a division there were ayes 58.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, said: We do not understand what the question is. Will the Chair please state it?

The SPEAKER. This is a communication from Mr. Jere Haralson on the subject of a contest for a seat in this House, now pending before the Committee of Elections. The question is whether this communication shall be printed.

Mr. KEIFER. Not in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Not in the RECORD, but in the usual form.

Mr. HERBERT. It will be proper for the Committee of Elections, when this paper has been referred to them, to decide whether they will recommend its printing or not. It seems to me we ought to leave the whole question with the Committee to which the document is to be referred.

Mr. FRYE. This is a colored contestant, and he wants the communication printed.

Mr. STEVENSON. Allow me to inquire whether it is desired merely that the paper be printed for the convenience of members of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. KEIFER. That is what we desire.

Mr. STEVENSON. It is not proposed to print it in the RECORD?

Mr. KEIFER. No, sir. I have not asked that.

The SPEAKER. It is proposed to print it in ordinary document form.

The negative vote was then taken on the motion of Mr. KEIFER that the communication be printed.

The SPEAKER announced that the result was—ayes 58, noes 35.

Mr. ACKLEN. Is there a quorum voting?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

Mr. ACKLEN. Then I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order.

Mr. FRYE. Taking the vote by tellers is the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint tellers. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] will act as tellers.

Mr. PHISTER. Will the Chair permit me to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio who offers this proposition?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. PHISTER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio, a member of the Committee of Elections, whether, according to the usual custom of that committee, this matter has been before the committee or a sub-committee, and whether they have requested that the document be printed.

Mr. KEIFER. I will answer by saying that the document has never been before the Committee of Elections or any sub-committee; they have never had occasion to look at it.

Mr. PHISTER. Then I cannot support the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. ACKLEN. I would like to ask the gentleman one question, which I hope he will answer to my satisfaction.

Mr. KEIFER. I will try to.

Mr. ACKLEN. Has not the Committee of Elections the right under a rule of the House to have printed such papers as the committee may desire without a special order of the House?

Mr. KEIFER. Not such a paper as this. Papers of a certain class—testimony, &c.—may be printed under that rule.

Mr. ACKLEN. I believe the rule embraces all papers relating to election contests.

Mr. MANNING. Having this moment entered the Hall, I may not be properly advised as to the application which the gentleman from Ohio has made. I am a member of the sub-committee to which this case has been referred; and I am taken by surprise that the gentleman should have asked for the leave which I understand he has asked. If there is any merit in the application, I am not aware of it.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me answer the gentleman. He has already been made aware that I had a memorial which I was asked to present. That is this memorial. It has never been before the Committee of Elections, or the sub-committee, for consideration; but in view of the action which we were unanimous in taking in the sub-committee, it is proper that the paper be printed so as to be laid before the sub-committee at its next meeting.

Mr. MANNING. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is right in saying that I have heard of this paper. Perhaps it would not be right that I should go further and relate the conversation between the gentleman and myself touching the merits of that paper. He has had it for some little time. We have several times given notice to Mr. Haralson to appear before the sub-committee, of which I am chairman, to say what he desired to say in support of the contest now pending between himself and General SHELLEY. We received only two or three days ago a letter which was addressed by Mr. Haralson to his attorney in this city, after a letter was received by Mr. Haralson from the Committee of Elections telling him of the action of the sub-committee. We postponed the case several times, giving Mr. Haralson great indulgence—greater perhaps than any other contestant whose case has been brought to the notice of the committee.

Now, I cannot see the purpose of my friend from Ohio in asking the House to print this paper. It can be referred to the committee and brought to their attention in that way. If the gentleman desires to ask merely its reference, that is another thing.

Mr. KEIFER. I have asked its reference and that it be printed, not in the RECORD but in the ordinary form, in order that it may go before our committee for consideration.

Mr. MANNING. And asking its reference is one thing, but asking it to be printed is quite another thing. We have some rules in that committee which it is well to observe.

Mr. KEIFER. To print evidence?

Mr. MANNING. And that is not to print everything, as you know, but only to print those matters which elucidate the questions we are to inquire into.

Mr. KEIFER. I think it is well to print this.

Mr. MANNING. I will say furthermore we have not heard of a similar application for printing testimony before that committee until the committee has acted on it.

Mr. KEIFER. This is not a matter of testimony——

Mr. LOWE. What is the substance of the memorial which it is asked shall be printed? We ought to know that, so we may vote on it understandingly.

Mr. KEIFER. It might be read.

Mr. LOWE. I do not think we should be asked to order the printing of a document before the Committee of Elections until we know what is the substance and character of the document.

Mr. KEIFER. It is a memorial to the House asking for certain power to go forward, or rather asking the House to take testimony on the part of this contestant and of a character which he represents he cannot take himself for reasons which he assigns in this memorial.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask, Is the memorial respectful in its character?

Mr. KEIFER. It is, in every respect.

Mr. FRYE. This matter being before the House, is it not the right of any member to demand it shall be read; and if read, will it not be printed in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. If the House is called to vote on any question, then it will be read of course.

Mr. KEIFER. I did not ask to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio presenting the memorial did not ask to have it read, as he has stated.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that the gentlemen on the other side are refusing to let it be printed. I do not believe a request of this kind was ever made before in this House and refused. It relates to the right of a member to a seat in this House and a gentleman rises and asks, stating it relates to the seat of a member, that the memorial may be printed and referred. I do not believe such a request was ever refused before, and I do not see why it should be refused in the case of this colored man.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has put the matter before the House on motion; and if refusal is made to the printing of this paper, I do not see but I have an undoubted right to ask it shall be read, and, if read, it will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MANNING. I am not so familiar with the precedents as the gentleman from Maine. It will be very well for him to go over the precedents before he charges us with having refused so reasonable a request. I cannot understand why the gentleman from Ohio, in view of the facts of this case, which are well known to him, and of the indulgence of the committee granted on several occasions to this contestant, and, finally, of an order made by the unanimous action of that committee—and I am not overstating the case, as the gentleman from Ohio himself concurred in that conclusion——

Mr. KEIFER. I have already stated that.

Mr. MANNING. Yes; it was the unanimous action of the committee that he should appear and show cause why his contest should not be dismissed, or we would report to the House that it should be dismissed. I wish to inquire why not have Mr. Haralson before the committee to answer that reasonable request made to him, not once but several times, and then in the event that we are unwilling to hear him, that we are unwilling to print anything which should be printed pursuant to the rules of the committee, then this House can be asked to act over our heads.

Now, so far as precedent is concerned, I am of the opinion that the course I suggest is the one which should be observed, and which doubtless will prove to be in harmony with the precedents and against none of them.

Mr. ACKLEN. Is it not a matter of fact, I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi, that if the Committee of Elections desire the printing of this paper they can have it printed under a general rule without bringing it to this House at all?

Mr. MANNING. I have made myself but poorly understood if I have not impressed that fact upon this House.

Mr. ACKLEN. I wish the House to understand it.

Mr. MANNING. There is no disposition, let me remark to the gentleman from Maine, as he has seen proper to call attention to the fact that this was a colored man, and possibly that has something to do with it—I say there is no disposition on the part of the committee because this is a colored man to make any departure from the ordinary practice in these cases. There has been no such disposition on the part of the committee in this case. I call upon the gentleman from Ohio to say whether he does not concur with me that there has been no disposition on the part of that committee to take any advantage of this colored man.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

Mr. MANNING. But every disposition to give him the amplest opportunity to be heard.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will give me an opportunity to be heard I will answer him.

Mr. HOUSE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio what is the character of the paper he asks to be printed?

Mr. KEIFER. I have tried to state that without going into detail.

Mr. HOUSE. There has been so much confusion over here I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. HAZELTON. What is the question before the House, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. PHISTER. Mr. Speaker, to solve this difficulty, I move to refer the question to the Committee of Elections. They will have a meeting on Tuesday next, and can then decide it. It will not be long to wait.

Mr. HOUSE. I should like to have an answer to my question.

Mr. KEIFER. I cannot answer when you are asking questions all the time.

Mr. HOUSE. Well, answer now.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to say, first, in reference to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Mississippi, that he is right substantially——

Mr. HOUSE. I do not yield the floor for that. I wish to know what is the name of the paper—what is the character of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, under the rule, is really entitled to the floor himself.

Mr. HOUSE. Very well, sir; let him have it.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Mississippi is right in saying they have granted very considerable indulgence to this gentleman. The committee has not undertaken to dismiss his contest or anything of that kind in a hurried way. It has given him notice, and that notice has not yet expired, to appear before the committee to show cause why his contest should not be dismissed, and as he says, properly I think, we all concurred in that. But he wants to know why he is not permitted to go before that committee and ask that certain things be printed, and so on.

Mr. MANNING. Let me correct the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me say this is a memorial, not to the sub-committee of the Committee of Elections, but it is a memorial to the House of Representatives, which the committee has nothing to do with, or the sub-committee, until it is referred there by the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Why not let it go through the petition-box, then?

Mr. KEIFER. Why not let it go through the petition-box! Because it is usual to print such a matter as this. Such important papers are always printed. I have not asked to have it read and printed in the RECORD, but it is a matter which must first go through the House.

Mr. FINLEY. Then the point I made is well taken.

Mr. KEIFER. I cannot yield for interruption. It can only be printed by order of the House.

Mr. FINLEY. I insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. FINLEY. This is a memorial to the House.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. And should go into the petition-box.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules that point of order, because the Chair thinks——

Mr. MANNING. Is it in order for me to move to lay the gentleman's motion upon the table?

Mr. KEIFER. I would hardly expect my colleague on the committee to make such an extraordinary motion as that.

Mr. MANNING. I am meeting the extraordinary motion on the part of the gentleman from Ohio with an extraordinary motion.

Mr. KEIFER. This is a thing which is done in every such case so far as my knowledge goes, and it is a most extraordinary thing to find objection made. The gentleman cannot complain I have not advised him of this memorial. Mr. Haralson is the only man who has a right to complain of me in this respect, because, as I advised with other members of the sub-committee, I did not hastily present this until I could hear from him further. And it is a singular fact he has not hitherto been able to get anybody to present the memorial, relying on me perhaps to have it done long ago. For reasons I have already stated to the committee I have not done it.

Mr. MANNING. Will the gentleman permit me to ask one question?

Mr. KEIFER. It is a proper memorial.

Mr. MANNING. One question.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANNING. Do you remember that notice was given to Mr. Haralson perhaps two months ago to appear before the committee and press his contest? Do you remember that?

Mr. KEIFER. I remember there was some notification given a long time ago to him or his counsel, I do not remember which. I am not controverting that. This is an original appeal to the House of Representatives.

Mr. MANNING. I understand that; but I want to ask the gentleman if that memorial has not been in his hands for some time?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANNING. A considerable time?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, sir; and I am derelict in not having presented it earlier.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. Is it not the rule of this House that petitions and memorials should be referred to the various committees through the petition-box? If so, is not this motion out of order?

Several MEMBERS. That has been overruled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair admitted this paper because it related to the right of a member to his seat on the floor. The Chair has not any doubt that a contestant has the right to appeal to the House touching his right to a seat. He therefore allowed the memorial to be presented. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] then said in answer to an inquiry of the Chair whether it was a respectful paper that it was so in every respect. The Chair then submitted the motion that it be printed in lieu, as the gentleman stated, of having it go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The Chair entertained that motion. If the House does not desire to print the paper it can vote it down.

Mr. FRYE. Now, before it is voted down I ask that the paper be read. I submit that I cannot be called upon to vote upon a paper till I hear it read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause Rule 141 to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

141. When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will also read a paragraph from the Digest in reference to the construction given to the rule just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The rule above recited is not construed to apply to the single reading of a paper or proposition upon which the House may be called upon to give a vote, or to the several regular readings of a bill, but to cases where a paper has been once read, or a bill has received its regular reading and another is called for, and also where a member desires the reading of a paper having relation to the subject before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always ruled that where the House is called upon to vote upon a paper or on any motion or question it has a right to hear it read, so that it may vote understandingly.

Mr. MANNING. May I be pardoned for asking the gentleman from Ohio one other question: Whether that dereliction which he has confessed in the face of the House proceeds from his doubt heretofore as to the substantial merit of this memorial on the part of Haralson?

Mr. KEIFER. No, sir. I wish to say it proceeded from the fact that the paper came into my hands without having been presented to me personally by the memorialist. It was accompanied by a memorandum, as to which I did not know whether it came from proper authority or not. I had no communication until recently with the memorialist. I think it is a very proper matter to come before the House, and that the presentation of it to the House is the only proper course if the memorialist is right in his statements. I hold a letter in my hands urging me to present this memorial, and I have taken the first opportunity after getting that letter to present it.

Mr. SAMFORD. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it allowable to have a paper read when the House is dividing?

The SPEAKER. A quorum did not vote, and tellers were asked for.

Mr. SAMFORD. Precisely. Now the question I ask is whether it was in order to call for the reading of a paper while the House was dividing?

The SPEAKER. The House was not dividing. It is not dividing now.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think there can be no objection to the printing of this memorial. Under the ordinary motion to print it would be printed simply as a public document.

Mr. KEIFER. That is all I have asked.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think there should be no objection to that and that the memorial should be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. KEIFER. That is my motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. I also think it would be well to add to the motion that the committee be authorized to inquire into the truth of the allegations contained in the memorial.

Mr. KEIFER. We can do that with a resolution later, if that is necessary.

Mr. SPRINGER. This memorialist makes some charges here against prominent citizens of Alabama.

Mr. KEIFER. Not by name, I think.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; by name.

The SPEAKER. Instructions can be given to the committee on that subject.

Mr. KEIFER. If, then, the objection is withdrawn——

Mr. MANNING. I have withdrawn no objection.

The SPEAKER. It was the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] who objected.

Mr. SAMFORD. Certainly I did.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman objected to the paper being printed in the RECORD, not in pamphlet form.

Mr. SAMFORD. I objected to the presentation of the memorial.

The SPEAKER. That the Chair overruled. The gentleman himself, subsequently, the Chair thinks, qualified his objection to the printing.

Mr. SAMFORD. Not until I was told the object was not to have the paper printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That is not the object now.

Mr. KEIFER. I have not asked that.

Mr. SAMFORD. Then I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair understood.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have just come into the Chamber, and do not understand all the proceedings of the House which took place previous to the time when I addressed the Chair. I did not know what was the state of the question. I hope that all objection will be withdrawn to the printing of this memorial in the ordinary form, and to its reference to the Committee of Elections. That certainly will do no harm to any one.

Mr. KEIFER. That is all I have asked.

The SPEAKER. That was the original suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I think I can assure the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] that the committee will do nothing that is not entirely right.

Mr. MANNING. If the gentleman from Ohio will vouch for the terms of this memorial, and that its allusions to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] are respectful, I will make no further objection.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not think there is anything in the memorial that is at all objectionable in that respect. I have no doubt there are statements in it, which the memorialist must necessarily make, that in some sense might involve the contestee; that will be inevitable. But there is nothing personal in these that will affect the gentleman improperly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair himself made that inquiry in order to keep on the safe side. If there is no further objection the memorial will be referred to the Committee of Elections, and printed in the usual form.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ISABEL L. EVANS.

Mr. CABELL. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions Senate bill No. 367, granting an increase of pension to Isabel L. Evans.

There was no objection; and the bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

CAPTAIN J. B. CAMPBELL.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask to have taken from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time Senate bill No. 317, for the relief of Captain J. B. Campbell. A bill identical with this has already passed the House and is now before the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request to the House. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] asks consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time a bill of the Senate for the relief of Captain J. B. Campbell. The Chair is informed that a bill in the exact language of the Senate bill has already passed the House and been sent to the Senate. There is, therefore, in each House a bill in exactly the same words which has been passed by the other House. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] asks that the Senate bill may be taken from the Speaker's table and considered at this time.

Mr. BRAGG. I have been instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to make that request.

The bill (S. No. 317) for the relief of Captain J. B. Campbell was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay a certain judgment in which Hugh Waters is plaintiff and J. B. Campbell is defendant, obtained in the United States circuit court for the district of Oregon, amounting, at the time it was rendered, to the sum of $2,100.50, and the further sum of $191.35 for court and witnesses' fees in defending said suit, said judgment having been obtained against said J. B. Campbell and costs incurred by him while acting in the line of his duty as captain of the United States Army.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCOID. I have a couple of resolutions of merely local interest which I desire to have passed this morning, in order that they may go the one to the Committee on Commerce and the other to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions will be read, after which objections will be in order.

COURT-ROOMS IN KEOKUK, IOWA.

Mr. McCOID asked consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it shall be in order for the Committee on Appropriations of this House, if they deem it expedient, to report in the sundry civil appropriation bill a provision authorizing the Attorney-General to take a lease from the attorney of Keokuk, Iowa, of so many rooms in the city hall in said city about to be erected as may be necessary for the proper accommodation of the United States courts holden in said city, and making an appropriation of such sum as the committee may deem reasonable to pay for said lease.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not object to the reference of that resolution.

Mr. McCOID. Let it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DRY-DOCK AT KEOKUK, IOWA.

Mr. McCOID also submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to consider the propriety of the erection of a dry-dock at Keokuk, Iowa, on the Mississippi River, and report thereon by bill or otherwise as early as possible.

ASSESSMENTS FOR SPECIAL IMPROVEMENTS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia Senate joint resolution No. 64, extending the provisions of the first section of an act entitled "An act fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of general taxes and assessments for special improvements now due to the District of Columbia, and for a revision of assessments for special improvements, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1879.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BLACKBURN asked leave for withdrawal from the files of the House of papers in the case of Mary Callan; which application was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COLLECTION OF INTERNAL REVENUE, SECOND DISTRICT, GEORGIA.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is stated in the public journals that citizens of the second Georgia collection district have been resisting the execution of the internal-revenue laws; and

Whereas it is also stated in such journals that the collector of said district has been instructed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to employ fifty deputies to maintain the supremacy of the law, and that fifty breech-loading muskets, with sufficient ammunition, have been issued to said deputies by said Commissioner; and

Whereas it is further stated that an expedition of eighty armed men, deputized as aforesaid, have been, on and after the 14th day of January, instant, raiding through the counties of Cherokee, Gilmer, Union, Fannin, Towns, and Rabun, in the State of Georgia, under the command of the internal-revenue authorities; and

Whereas it is further stated that portions of said force have been fired on and fusiladed by said illicit distillers, and that said force fired on the people of the country and kept them at bay with their long-range pieces; and

Whereas it is also stated that the large majority of the people were in sympathy with the law-breakers, which reason occasioned the necessity for said extraordinary force of armed men and for said raid; and

Whereas it is also stated, by the officer in command of said raid, that there is less violation of law than heretofore, and that the people are much more ready to aid the officers in putting down lawlessness, and that law-abiding citizens of those counties so raided are willing to act as deputies, and that therefore there is no necessity for such raiding parties; and

Whereas such reports purport to be authenticated by the Internal-Revenue Department:

Resolved, That the honorable Secretary of the Treasury be requested to lay before Congress all evidence on file in the Internal-Revenue Office, and all papers and reports of the collector of said district, and letters and other documentary evidence from official sources, going to show the true state of affairs touching the enforcement of the internal-revenue laws in Northeast Georgia, and tending to explain the necessity for raiding expeditions of armed men at the instance of the Internal-Revenue Department, and which may give information to the House of Representatives on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. WILLITS. I object.

Mr. SPEER. I ask, then, that the resolution be printed, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

LIBRARY IN THE SURGEON-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an estimate for the completion of the catalogue in the library of the Surgeon-General's Office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BRENTS also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House what military reservations in Washington Territory can be restored to the public domain without detriment to the military service.

MRS. S. A. WRIGHT.

Mr. BALLOU, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Patents, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2414) for the relief of Mrs. S. A. Wright; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish this House with the names and lineal rank of all officers of the Army not on duty with their regiments or corps, but doing duty elsewhere, and the nature of that duty; the length of time each has been absent from his regiment or corps; the length of time each so absent has been performing the duty he is now engaged upon; the total amount of extra pay and cash value of emoluments, if any, each has received over and above that due to his lineal rank by reason of such duty away from his regiment or corps; the amount of extra compensation each is now drawing yearly, and the reasons why, if any, such extra compensation should now be allowed.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. NEAL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. DEATH OF HON. RUSH CLARK.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I arise for the purpose of submitting resolutions of respect to the memory of Hon. RUSH CLARK, late one of my colleagues in this House, and I ask that the resolution introduced by me on the 14th day of this month be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the special order for Saturday, the 31st day of January, 1880, at two o'clock p. m., shall be the presentation of suitable resolutions in reference to the death of Hon. RUSH CLARK, late a member of this House, and the expression by members of the esteem in which he was held by his associates on this floor.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, for an hour we stop the wheels of legislation, and turn our backs upon questions which cause diversity of opinion and clash of conflicting interests, to give attention to the consideration of a subject and an event which no legislation can affect and no statute can change.

Death, it is well understood, is no respecter of persons. He strikes alike in cabin, cottage, or palace. Place, position, or power make no change in his purpose. On this floor he has repeatedly asserted his prerogative as a privileged member. No resolution or statute devised by human ingenuity or enforced by human power controls in any degree his movements. When he demands the previous question it is always seconded, always sustained. No motion to postpone, commit, or amend is in order. The grim monster never lacks a quorum, and can always command a majority, for "all that tread this earth are but a handful compared to those that slumber in its bosom."

My late colleague, Hon. RUSH CLARK, commenced his career in this House at the opening of the Forty-fifth Congress with apparently as good a prospect of long life as most of us, and because of his fewer years much better than some of us. But, sir, in the meridian of his manhood, with hopes and aspirations reaching onward into the future, and upward toward the achievement of deeds which might make the world glad that he had lived, he was in an unexpected moment, and almost without notice, arrested by the summons which sooner or later will be served upon all of us, and compelled to exhibit his accounts and his character where forever the debits and credits of the former must remain as he placed them, and the latter know no change except in degree.

Mr. CLARK was born in Bedford County, Pennsylvania, October 1, 1834; graduated at Jefferson College in that State in 1853, and removed to Iowa City the same year, where he resided until his death. He was a member of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa from 1860 to 1864, and for two years of that time speaker of the house; he was also a member of the board of trustees of the Iowa State University, in all of which positions he discharged the duties devolving upon him in such a manner as to command the respect and confidence of all classes of people.

My acquaintance with Mr. CLARK was of a general and not of an intimate character until I met him as a member on this floor. I shall therefore leave others to speak more particularly of his character as a man and a citizen. I may be permitted, however, to say that as a man Mr. CLARK was social, unassuming, and kind in his deportment. As a legislator, either State or national, his constituents could rely implicitly on his energy, industry, and honesty in attending promptly to all the business which belonged to his position, and the members of this House who served with him in the Forty-fifth Congress, and in the first or special session of the Forty-sixth Congress, until his death, will bear witness to the fact that few members were more constantly in their seats during the sessions of the House than he.

Mr. CLARK was apparently in as good health as usual on the evening of one day, and on the evening of the next he had no place among the living. The going down of the sun on the evening of the 27th of April, 1879, found him busy with the cares and activities of this life. The setting of the sun on the evening of the next day found him a dweller in the spirit-land.

This sad event, Mr. Speaker, forces the conviction upon all of us who still occupy positions on the time side of the river of death—

> That when the angel of shadow
> Rests his feet on wave and shore,
> And our eyes grow dim with watching,
> And our hearts faint at the oar,
>
> Happy is he who heareth
> The signal of his release
> In the bells of the Holy City,
> The chimes of eternal peace.

But, sir, no eulogy that I can pronounce, no tribute that I can bring to the memory of my late colleague, can equal that which was accorded him by the people of his own city, his neighbors and acquaintances who had known him intimately for more than a quarter of a century, and who turned out en masse to his funeral. His monument is in the hearts of those who knew him longest and best. Mr. Speaker, Mr. CLARK is no longer of this earth. He will answer never again to the roll-call in this Chamber. He has been called to visit that "undiscovered country, from whose bourn no traveler returns." And may I not add, sir, that these sudden and solemn calls so frequently made upon members of this House during the last two years should admonish us who remain to

> So live, that when the summons comes to join
> The innumerable caravan which moves
> To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
> His chamber in the silent halls of death,
> We go not, like the quarry slave at night,
> Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
> By an unfaltering trust, approach the grave
> Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

I submit the following resolutions:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret of the death of Hon. RUSH CLARK, late a member of this House from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect to his memory the officers and members of this body will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the Senate, and that as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Speaker, RUSH CLARK, our deceased brother, was born in the district that I have the honor to represent in this Congress. Therefore, it is fitting in me to rise to second the resolutions presented to this body in respect to him and to bring my tribute to his worth and my praise to his many ennobling qualities. RUSH

CLARK was born in the beautiful village of Schellsburgh, Bedford County, Pennsylvania, on the 11th day of October, 1834. His father, John Clark, was of Scotch-Irish family and was born in Cumberland County, Pennsylvania. His mother was born near the line between the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland, opposite Hancock. His parents were among the early settlers of the lovely valley in which RUSH was born, and they were universally respected and beloved far and near by all who knew them for their hospitality and their upright Christian walk.

RUSH CLARK was the sixth son of John and Mary Clark. His deep and fervent love for his father and mother made him linger long around the threshold of his childhood's home. During the period when he was at home basking in parental affection I first made his acquaintance. How well I now remember his happy home, the warm, brotherly and sisterly love that ever greeted him! He was generous and kind, intellectually bright, and full of life, energy, and untiring zeal. He did not doubt when he met obstacles or reverses in his pathway; he moved on with renewed courage until he overcame every difficulty and accomplished his aim.

His boyhood days were pleasant and happy. He imbibed and ingrafted into his being the loveliness of the country in which he lived. There the morning sun kissed into life and beauty the many flowers that grew up around his home; there the evening shadows of the mighty Alleghany rested upon the earth he trod. He was surrounded by relatives and friends who encouraged him to deeds of kindness and honor. A relative who loved him and knew him well writes me, "If I were called upon to pass a eulogium ever so brief, it would be that RUSH CLARK loved his mother and lived for the good he might do others." What more need be said in praise of our deceased brother? He will live in the memory of all those who knew him. The great good he did for others surpasses in grandeur the greatest intellectual and political achievements of his wonderfully successful life. Ecclesiastes taught that "a good name is better than precious ointment." Lord Bacon said, "Death has this also, that it openeth the gate to good fame and extinguisheth envy." Thus it will be with the memory of our deceased brother. His good name, his kind disposition, his benevolence, his pleasing manners, his great ability, and his social qualities will be remembered long after his body molders to "mother dust."

He was liberally educated. He attended the schools at Schellsburgh; then went to the Ligonier Academy in Westmoreland County, a place of learning of high reputation, under the charge of an elder brother; from there he entered Jefferson College and graduated with the highest honors. He then went West to carve for himself a name and fame in a new country far from his relatives and the friends of his youth. He located in Iowa City, then the capital of the State, read law, and was admitted to the bar. He gallantly and manfully struggled in his profession to attain eminence, and soon made for himself a reputation that secured him a good practice. In 1860, at the age of twenty-six, he was elected a member of the General Assembly of Iowa, and was continued in the position until the close of the session of 1864, and was speaker of the house in 1863 and 1864. He also held a number of positions of trust and honor in the State, and was elected in 1876 to the Forty-fifth Congress, and in 1878 re-elected to the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. Speaker, we separated in the days of his boyhood, and only met again here at the extra session. I did not then imagine that in a few days we would separate to meet no more until the great waters of the deep, the mountains, and the valleys give up their dead. The last time I saw him alive was the night before his death; when we parted he said, "We will meet at the House to-morrow." We did not meet. Death during the night laid its icy grasp upon him, and when the hour arrived when we should have met at the House, his spirit was taking its flight from "the shore touched by the mysterious sea that never yet has borne on any wave the image of a homeward sail."

How sudden was his death! He was in the prime of life. Many years of distinction and honor were apparently before him. He was beloved, because he was frank, candid, and sincere, and looked with the eye of charity upon the failings and mistakes of men. "He believed in the power of kindness, and spanned with divine sympathy the gulf that separates the fallen from the pure." We are called upon to mourn the loss of one who in a brief time accomplished much, but promising more and more if he had not been cut off so early in life.

Ne'er gathered the reaper fruit more fair,
Never the shadows of dark despair,
Fell on a deeper woe.
Gone from his task half complete,
Gone from caresses kind and sweet,
Into Death's arms of snow.

Mr. Speaker, I have no language to describe my feelings when I viewed his form encased in the casket of the dead. Handsome in death as he was pure in life, I remembered that Shakespeare had defined death to be "the blind cave of eternal night," and I trembled at the thought, but I quickly drew sweet and enduring consolation from the divine promise of the Saviour of mankind when he declared: "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you." Bulwer has feelingly expressed:

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore,
And bright in Heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

His remains are interred in his adopted State. The people of Iowa will cherish his memory for his devotion to their interests, and the statutes and public records of that State will be a lasting monument to his intellect and legal ability. His friends in Pennsylvania will forever mourn his loss and the country at large will regret the early and sudden demise of an able Representative in Congress—

Gone from his country's august claim,
Where he, from the lofty dome of fame,
Hung like a bright polar star;
Swift as a sunbeam snatched away
By a sudden cloud when April day
Broods in the heavens afar.

Mr. SAPP. Mr. Speaker, Death, always an unwelcome messenger, is especially so when he claims as his victim one with whom we have been closely associated. This thought is impressed upon my mind on this occasion, set apart in commemoration of the death of my late colleague, Hon. RUSH CLARK. In sorrow for the necessity which exists, I, too, sir, second the motion to adopt the resolutions before us. There are times when obituaries become an imperative duty, and a conviction of this is the motive that governs me to-day. Our relations for many years were such that it makes this duty a painful one; but I cannot allow this occasion to pass without paying a brief tribute to his memory. I have not the gift of eulogy, and will not attempt to make one; but I would, while these solemn rites are passing, lay a few garlands of regard and affection on his grave.

Mr. CLARK died at his hotel in this city on the 28th day of April last, suddenly and unexpectedly. No intelligence of his sickness and approaching dissolution had reached his constituents, neighbors, and friends at his home until after Death, the conqueror of all, had done his work.

I parted with him in the afternoon of the day preceding his death to visit my home in the West. He was then buoyant and hopeful, saying to me as I left him that he never felt better in his life. On the following morning but one I was startled by the shocking intelligence that he was dead. And in the same hour, by the electric spark, the sad announcement that "Hon. RUSH CLARK, of Iowa, is dead" sped away to his far-off home, to his friends and trusting constituents.

Mr. CLARK was a native of Pennsylvania, having been born at Schellsburgh, Bedford County, in that State, on the 1st day of October, 1834.

His education was begun in the public schools, after which he received an academic training preparatory to entering Jefferson College, at which institution he graduated with honors in 1853. Shortly after this, filled with that spirit of enterprise which has led to the wonderful growth and development of the great West, he emigrated to Iowa, selecting as his home Iowa City. He first commenced the study of medicine, but in a short time, finding this profession uncongenial to his tastes and wishes, he turned his attention to the study of law, and, when prepared, was admitted to practice in the several courts of that State. From that time until his death he kept an office and practiced this profession with success.

Mr. CLARK was repeatedly called upon by his fellow-citizens to fill places of honor and trust. He was elected by the people of Johnson County to represent them in the General Assembly in 1860, and was re-elected to that office in 1862, serving during this term as speaker of the house of representatives. He was elected to and held the honorable and responsible position of trustee of the Iowa State University from 1862 until 1866. He was again elected a representative to the State Legislature, which position he resigned upon being nominated by the party to which he belonged as their candidate for Representative to the Forty-fifth Congress, and to which he was elected. He served with fidelity and ability, as all of us know who served with him in that Congress. So faithfully and well had he served the people who elected him that he was renominated without opposition and was again elected by a very large majority to this Congress.

I shall not attempt to give even a general statement of the way he performed the arduous and responsible duties of Representative here, but this much may with propriety be said, that in the discharge of his public duties the great leading and controlling question with him was: What is right? And when he had settled that question he firmly adhered to his convictions, never permitting considerations of policy or expediency to divert him from the right. He was unremitting in his attention to the business interests and wants of his constituents, ever devoting himself to the discharge of his whole duty to them and to the country. He was prompt, regular, and constant in his attendance upon the sessions of the House and the meetings of his committees.

Mr. CLARK possessed a quick, active mind, enabling him at a glance to comprehend a subject requiring thought and study with many others. As a man he was always, under all circumstances, urbane, kind, courteous, and genial. His generosity knew no bounds. Ever thoughtful of the happiness and well-being of others, he was of necessity a marked favorite in the community in which he lived. Possessing these noble qualities in a high degree, he endeared himself to all with whom he was intimately associated.

But there are none, sir, who know so well the full measure of his noble generosity, of his kind and sympathizing heart, as do the grief-stricken wife and children who were the recipients of all that is good and noble in a husband and father. Yet we should pause here and draw the veil over a sorrow so sacred. It is not for us to intrude therein. It has been said that a merciful Providence confers on man a most gracious boon when He conceals from him the "time that he shall cease to be." Spared the weary hours of pain, the wan specter of anxiety and anguish, the relentless warnings of the pale messenger, he receives unheralded the final stroke. To those who so believe there may be comfort in the death of our friend whose early summons we all so much deplore. His call was so sudden, so unexpected that it is difficult to believe that the seal of death has really been placed upon him, that he has crossed the cold river to the spirit land, and that all there was of earth to him has forever passed away.

Truly "in the midst of life we are in death."

Mr. MANNING. Mr. Speaker, the inexorable voice of mortality is again heard in these halls of legislation for the sixth time in the recent past, and pursuant to an immemorial custom, we have ceased our daily routine of labors that we may pay fitting tribute to the memory of our departed associate, RUSH CLARK.

I ask but a brief space in which to contribute a modest chaplet on the same hallowed shrine, in addition to the highly graceful tributes which have been presented by those who were longer and more intimately acquainted with our deceased friend than myself.

We were all greatly shocked by the suddenness with which he was stricken down while at his post of duty in this city, on the 28th day of April last, and while in the midst of a public career honorable to himself and his people.

The simple story of his life is a far better eulogy than the plaudits of admiring friends. He was born in Schellsburgh, Pennsylvania, on the 1st of October, 1834, and was therefore called to enter the great beyond in the forty-fifth year of his age. His alma mater was Jefferson College of the same State; and immediately after graduating at that college in 1853 he removed to Iowa City, Iowa, where he continued to reside, and in a short time thereafter entered upon the practice of the law. As a lawyer he soon enjoyed that distinction to which he was entitled by his marked ability, energy, and integrity. In 1860, when the war clouds were lowering upon the country, in the hope of serving his State at this critical juncture he was elected to the Legislature and at once took front rank among the leaders of the party to which he belonged.

In 1861, when the tocsin of war first sounded in the land and the whole population was springing to arms, he accepted service upon the staff of Iowa's governor with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and was at once active and efficient in sending forward to the war armed men for the maintenance of the Union of States.

In 1862 he was re-elected to the Legislature, and was elevated to the position of speaker, the delicate and responsible duties of which place he discharged with dignity, ability, and fairness, although at that time he was only about twenty-eight years of age.

Soon after the restoration of peace he resumed the practice of his profession, forming a copartnership with Judge W. J. Haddock, which continued until dissolved by his untimely death. He re-entered the halls of his State Legislature in 1876, although to do so involved a sacrifice of his personal and business interests. At the ensuing congressional election he was rewarded by his party for the eminent and patriotic service he had rendered his State and country by electing him to the Forty-fifth Congress, and again in 1878 by returning him to the Forty-sixth Congress.

Those who knew him upon this floor know how faithfully and promptly he responded to every duty that devolved upon him, and it is not strange that his generous impulses, strong mental faculties, pure private and public character, and love of country's honor and welfare, secured for him a warm place in the hearts of his constituency, whose interests he ever guarded and protected with so much zeal and efficiency. An exalted public spirit ever animated his breast; and every movement, whether originated in legislative halls or elsewhere, which in his judgment tended to benefit the country in large or small degree, and bring peace and fraternal relations to the whole people, received his utmost aid.

Now that his life is finished the testimony is cheerfully borne by all who knew him, without regard to party affiliations, that he left to his family, friends, and country a name without a stain.

The following resolutions adopted by the citizens and professional associates of his distant home attest the esteem and affection of those in whose midst his life had been spent:

As citizens of Iowa City, desiring to express our sorrow in view of the death of our friend and neighbor, Hon. RUSH CLARK, we resolve,

1. That we cherish a grateful remembrance of his many public and private virtues, his genial disposition and courteous bearing, and his ready and able advocacy of all that tended to promote the material, social, and educational prosperity of our city.

2. That we rejoice in the merited distinction which he attained in his profession and in the legislative councils of the State and nation, and we deeply mourn that his life should so suddenly close in the midst of so much promise of usefulness and honor.

3. That our sympathy is hereby tendered to the family and relatives of our departed friend, knowing as we do that this bereavement robs them of one whose domestic virtues rendered him peculiarly dear to them.

Truly, it can be said of him, "He was the noblest work of God—an honest man."

He was too brief a time a Representative in the Congress of this Government to afford him either time or opportunity to adequately impress upon the country the many sterling qualities of head and heart which so much adorned his character, and which would have resulted in benefiting so greatly all who were so fortunate as to come within the reach of their influence. In all the range of his social and political relations his bearing was marked by such loftiness and purity of purpose that the profoundest respect was paid him by his adversaries, and the sincerest affection by those with whom he co-operated.

Be it known, Mr. Speaker, to the credit of our humanity that while we pause in our labors to observe the time-honored custom of laying our tributes upon the tomb of a departed colleague, party distinctions are unknown, as is beautifully illustrated by the intermingling at this hour of the voices of his political friends and adversaries.

His mind had received the training and discipline of a quarter of a century of active mental labor, and the invigoration of countless collisions in intellectual gladiatorship, both in temples of justice and upon the hustings—ever wielding the scimitar of argument with manliness and dignity. As a statesman he was conservative in all his views, appealing always to the pure and elevated judgment, and not to the passions or prejudices of the people. On the page of RUSH CLARK'S history it can be truthfully written that he "was of the most artless, candid, open, and benevolent disposition, disinterested in the extreme; of a temper mild and placable even to a fault, without one drop of gall in his whole constitution."

But he is gone forever from the earth, and only his deeds can live after him, which, let us believe, will improve and elevate those who remain. The gladsome songs, the voice of loved ones, the beauties of nature are no more for him.

Rest and sleep, sleep and rest! There are many who mourn you—eyes that are dimmed with tears as they remember with grateful hearts your many generous acts of kindness. There are those who feel that your place can never be filled. "The best portion of a good man's life are the little, nameless, unremembered acts of tenderness and love," with which your life was made redolent and glorious.

From these events of Providence we should receive not alone the impression that in the midst of life we are in death, but also that as death ends life is filled up with duties.

Our brother has fallen asleep. May he sleep on in peace until the last grand revielle of recorded time shall awake him again and summon him from on high to mount the radiant heights of glory on the dread morning of the resurrection. Death is not the end;

> It but breedeth an infinite beginning;
> Limits are for time, and death killed time;
> Eternity's beginning is forever.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, the Great Reaper has been in our midst. He who considers neither age, nor sex, nor condition of man, who inexorably and impartially cuts down the young, the middle-aged, and the old, has laid his icy hand upon one of our number in the prime of life, in the full enjoyment of every intellectual faculty and in the mid-career of manly activity and usefulness.

RUSH CLARK, of Iowa, has "swept through the gates," and he will come in and go out with us no more forever. His accustomed seat in this Hall is now filled by another. His life in this world is ended; his mission accomplished, and he has gone to join the innumerable caravan in that undiscovered country from which there is no return.

Well and truly has it been said by one of earth's wisest sages, man's life is but a hand-breadth; a solemn truth, of which, in the hurry of business, in the toil and turmoil of life, and in the pursuit of the phantoms of our hopes, aspirations, and desires we too often lose sight, until rudely brought to our recollection by such a death as that of our late associate. We determine upon our plans, we lay out our work, we arrange our programme for the long vista of years, which, panorama-like unfolds itself before us, when suddenly, mayhap without warning, our lives are required of us, and the bright and brilliant future fades away into the black nothingness of death. And this is all we are certain of in this world. Why even now—

> Our hearts,
> Like muffled drums, are beating
> Funeral marches to the grave.

Mr. Speaker, it was not my good fortune to have known Mr. CLARK previously to the assembling of the Forty-fifth Congress in this Hall in the month of October, 1877. We met here and then for the first time, strangers to each other as we were to most of those who were to be our associates during the life of that Congress. An acquaintance early formed soon ripened into a friendship which continued without a jar until he yielded up this life on the 28th day of April last to the resistless demand of that master of the human race, Death!

I early discovered that he was a man of high sense of honor, of irreproachable integrity, of fair abilities, fine literary and professional acquirements, and sterling patriotism; that he possessed a heart of as tender susceptibilities as a woman, without pretension and without sham. He fully appreciated the responsibilities of life, and met them in a right, manly way. To him—

> Life was real, life was earnest,
> And the grave was not its goal.

There was nothing sordid nor mean about him; nothing low, base, nor groveling. His aspirations were ever upward and onward, "ad astra per aspera;" and he appreciated this earth and the things thereof only so far as they aided him to achieve that which was of the intellect and the spirit. His inspirations were:

Build thee more lofty mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll,
Leave thy low vaulted past,
Let each new temple, grander than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by Time's unresting sea.

Mr. Speaker, I said he was a man of sterling patriotism; and so he was. It was bounded by no narrow State lines. The whole country was his fatherland, and he alike rejoiced in the prosperity of the East, the West, the North, and the South. Although a citizen and a Representative of one of the most flourishing of the States of the Union, a State which is already a very giant among her sister States, and whose future is as bright and promising as the most sanguine of her children could ask for, a State which our associate loved right well, and he was proud of Iowa, of her enterprising people, of her past history and brilliant future, yet the fountains of his heart did not congeal as he passed beyond her border. He loved the whole country as well, for he was more an American than he was an Iowan, and he could illy appreciate the feelings and judgments of those whose horizon was bounded by the contracted limits of their own petty State, and whose vision was so limited that they saw nothing to love and admire and to excite their patriotic emotions in the grand reality that they are citizens of the great and proud and free Republic of America. With him before all else was the nation; the State occupied a secondary place in his heart, his judgment, and affections.

He was an earnest advocate of republican principles and polity, because he believed those principles to be founded upon the firm basis of justice and right, and that the continued supremacy of the republican party was essential to the peace, the prosperity, and well-being of the American people; yet he judged not unkindly those who conscientiously differed from him in opinion. I question whether a single member of the Forty-fifth Congress ever heard from his lips an unkind word or an uncharitable expression.

He was possessed of a large heart, and his sympathies were with the people. Oppression and wrong, wherever or by whomsoever exercised, he denounced with honest indignation. Incapable himself of wrongfully depriving any one, even the humblest and most obscure, of the rights bestowed by Providence or guaranteed by law, he could illy brook to see others do so, and was unable to understand how any one possessing the instincts of an honest man or the principles of a gentleman could persuade himself to reap the fruits of a crime or enjoy the emoluments of office obtained by outrage upon the sacred rights of the people. He desired to see our Government in truth and in fact, as it is in name, "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say but a word more. I honored Mr. CLARK for his many estimable qualities of heart and intellect, for his manly independence, for his quick apprehension of the right, and his firm determination at all times to do the right as power and insight were given him to discern it, regardless of the consequences to himself. But although in all these views and opinions my judgment heartily approved and my heart fully sympathized, yet beyond them all I loved him because he was my friend—sincere, earnest, and true; and for this I drop the silent tear upon his grave, and pay this last tribute of respect to his memory.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the humble and brief tribute which duty as well as inclination leads me at this time to bring as friendship's offering to lay on the grave of my honored friend and dead predecessor, though long delayed, will be none the less sincere and heart-born. And the eloquent and well-timed utterances of those who have preceded me leaves but little more to be said.

Many circumstances led to a more than usual intimacy and friendship between Mr. CLARK and myself. We were near the same age, both born and reared to manhood's years in the same State, the old Keystone; and in the morning of young manhood both, in the latter part of the year 1853, left our native State and went to the young and then extreme frontier State of Iowa, scarcely known in the bright constellation of our grand sisterhood of States at that time. He was without friends and but little means, among strangers and in a strange land. He had nothing to rely upon except his own energy and high resolve to conquer difficulties and overcome obstacles by an upright life and honorable conduct; and like every true-hearted American youth, he had unfaltering faith in the future of his country. He loved her institutions, her laws, and, above all, felt the hope-giving fact and realized the grand truth that the highway to usefulness, honor, and fame was not monopolized by the accident of birth, nor was the pathway to renown by divine right the property of either class or person, and the gates to the temple of fame opened not at the touch of golden keys. Recognizing no aristocracy except the aristocracy of brains, by his own energy, industry, and honest labor he sought to achieve whatever of success in life he might, knowing that under our Government these ways were open to the poorest and humblest boy in our broad land who with an honest purpose fights the battle of life with a good intent.

The occasion of our first meeting, and the forming of an acquaintance which in after years ripened into a friendship unbroken during his life, and which will for all coming time remain to me a sacred memory, is worthy of special note at this time. It has lately become a question of some interest as to which State called, and, in fact, held the first republican State convention, several claiming that honor. I deem it fitting to state upon this occasion that on the 22d day of February, 1854, in the then capital of Iowa, a republican State convention assembled under the call of a few citizens of the State, and upon that day and occasion I had the honor of being present as a delegate, and then and there met for the first time Mr. CLARK. He was not a delegate, but being a resident of the city and in active sympathy with the movement was present, and very materially aided by his wise, well-digested, and carefully prepared counsel in forming the platform of principles adopted by the convention, which then nominated for governor that noble man and grand statesman, James W. Grimes, whose subsequent career in the councils of the nation made his name a familiar household word, and whose acts and doings make one of the brightest pages in our country's history, and who at the following election, then held in the month of August, 1854, was chosen as chief executive of the State, and, as I claim, the first republican nominated or elected to a State office. With these scenes I ask that the name of my honored predecessor stand associated for all time to come, and as a tribute to his worth, who, although so young and inexperienced, dare, in the face of a defiant majority stand true to his convictions and sacrifice present success that conscience should remain approved.

It was my privilege to know him well and long, nor can I now realize that more than a quarter of a century has passed since I first met him, and that those years bridge the chasm separating that day from the time of his decease. In these years I was associated with him as an attorney of the same judicial district, and practicing often at the same bar. I watched with pride his career in the General Assembly of our State, rejoiced when I saw him called to preside over their deliberations as speaker of the house, and all his public acts received the plaudit of "Well done, good and faithful servant," and in all these various positions of honor and trust which he through the partiality of his countrymen was called to fill he discharged the duties of each with that same marked ability and integrity which silenced the fault-finder, and in the presence of his pure, unsullied life as a public man the tongue of slander was mute and vituperation died on lips that would detract, and after he had discharged these duties, public confidence so firmly established called to him to come up higher, and he was intrusted with the proud honor of representing his district in this House, and though among the youngest of those who achieve this distinction, he brought to the work a varied experience and ripe judgment, which enabled him to do credit to himself and honor to those he represented.

But a strange, mysterious Providence, to mortal wisdom incomprehensible, as he was just entering upon his second term in this House, at an unexpected moment called him to go hence, and in obedience to the inexorable summons he went from an active, useful life, in the prime of matured manhood, out into the mysterious realms unexplored by mortal man and from which no human voice gives back a response to ours. And faith and hope only give assurance that we may meet again. I received from him the last letter he ever penned. It was written the Saturday before he died, and the startling words "RUSH CLARK is dead" flashed along the wires and were read by many a moistened eye hours before I received and opened his last letter, and as I read the lines the truth came with crushing weight, that the hand which so lately penned those lines was then palsied in death and the eye that watched the page as the words of confidence were formed was forever closed. How true the poet's words:

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour.
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Mr. CLARK possessed a high order of oratory; not, it is true, that kind which sweeps like a tornado, not that heroic, impassioned eloquence which captivates the imagination, leaving the reason and judgment untouched, but a clear, classical statement, compact and logical, forcing conviction on the hearts of all who heard it that his utterances were the result of honest convictions. Always gentlemanly and courteous, sensitive himself, he was ever tender of the feelings of others; and even in the fiercest contests before courts and juries, where intellectual swords flashed keen and bright, whatever he may have felt he never forgot himself so far as to utter a word or sentence which required a subsequent explanation or apology, and yet when once convinced of the right he was heroically loyal to those convictions. He never betrayed a friend or compromised a principle. As a husband he was kind, considerate, and devoted. As a father he was sincerely and wholly attached to his children, and was a most indulgent parent, and in their midst, under his own roof-tree, surrounded by wife and children, so enshrined in his manly and loving heart was the place and circumstances which gave to him unalloyed pleasure, not enjoyed under any other circumstances.

That beautiful home is now lonely, dark, and sad. Gloom and sorrow brood in the hearts of those he loved so well and tenderly. And while human sympathy in the presence of so great a sorrow feels that it can do but little, still it gives to those lowering clouds the silver lining.

And if it be true that the good deeds men do die with them and the evil deeds survive, I thank Heaven that his life was such that no intentional wrong on his part survived him. To his orphaned children he left a heritage of honor and an unblemished character, in coming years the comtemplation of which will bring to their hearts only joy and gladness. And at his grave, on the beautiful hillside near his former home, they may in aftertime repair and there recall his example and emulate his virtues.

Could he have written his own epitaph, he would have them read:

When to their airy hall my Father's voice
Shall call my spirit, joyful in their choice,
When poised upon the gale my form shall ride,
Or dark in mist descend the mountain's side,
O may my shade behold no sculptured urns
To mark the spot where earth to earth returns;
No lengthened scroll, no praise-incumbered stone—
My epitaph shall be my name alone.
If that with honor fail to crown my clay,
Oh, may no other fame my deeds repay;
That, only that, shall single out the spot:
By that remembered or with that forgot.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, well may we stand uncovered and with solemn mien in the presence of death. On either hand are only the crumbling walls of mortality; behind, all the world, alike forgetting and forgotten; before us the silent, unsounded sea stretching away to the echoless shore. Across the starless waste another of our number has gone. The ordinary business is suspended while we pay the customary tribute to his memory and connect, perchance for the last time, his name with the records of this House. Others may speak of RUSH CLARK as they knew him in these Halls; of his patient, untiring labor; of his faithful, conscientious discharge of duty, his devotion to his convictions of right, and his unswerving loyalty to his country and to truth. The tribute I would bring springs from the pleasant associations of almost a quarter of a century of intimate acquaintance, and is that which a friend pays to the cherished memory of a friend. 'Tis melancholy communion we hold by an open grave, with the vanished years speaking to us of all their joys and sorrows—

In tones as voiceless as the steps of thought.

Starting in our profession very nearly the same time, living for a while in the same judicial district, and practicing in the same courts, our pathways for years ran close together. Close only in point of time and personal and professional contact. His career lay along the heights, on which fell the full effulgence of erudition's light; mine the plodder's path, that only skirts the mountain's base.

While many who enter the contest for the honors, so tempting, and yet so hard to win, in the legal profession, are exhausted, or become discouraged when they have reached the steps of the temple of justice or are jostled within its vestibule, RUSH CLARK did not rest until he had pressed his way to its very altars, and brought to its service all the energy and enthusiasm of his noble nature. He knew that no half-hearted devotion would find acceptance there or bring the coveted reward. He studied and practiced his profession with a proper conception of its dignity and exalted character. He was not of those who regard it as a means to a selfish and sordid end, an occupation or calling by which he might simply amass wealth, or a mere stepping-stone to the gratification of political ambition.

His views of the law were broad and comprehensive. To him it was a science, beautiful and symmetrical; a fabric grand and inspiring, not a net-work of technicalities to ensnare the weak while the strong might escape its restraints. His conception of its majesty is well expressed in the words of Hooker: "Her seat is the bosom of God, and her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage; the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power."

As a practitioner he was careful and laborious, seldom entering upon the trial of a case without full and thorough preparation. He made his client's cause his own, and carried into the contest all the zeal and energy of mind and body. Tenacious and persevering, he seldom abandoned a case of importance until he had the decision of the court of final resort.

In many respects he was a strong advocate. He had a clear, logical, and well-disciplined mind. His style was terse and forcible, and his manner pleasing and dispassionate. His very earnestness made him impressive, and his well-known honesty in the maintenance and expression of his views and opinions gave him weight before courts and juries.

He had fairly won and deservedly held an enviable position at the bar of his State, and left a name and record which are among the richest of his legacies to his family and friends.

Mr. CLARK was a man of cordial qualities and gracious manners. His purity of life and character, his honesty and probity none ever questioned. Everywhere he went, and in all the relations of life, he gathered about him hosts of warm personal friends, and "grappled them to his soul with hooks of steel." Within the sacred precincts of that home of which he must have been the light, and it the joy of his life, we will not intrude. It could not have been other than the abode of peace and love—that sweetest of all boons to mortals given—endeared by affection and hallowed by the joys and sorrows shared with each other and borne together under the shelter of its roof.

From 1853 he had made Iowa City his home. His manhood was spent there. There were the scenes of his early struggles and ultimate triumphs. He allied himself with every movement for the advancement of the growth and prosperity of his adopted city. Liberal and generous to a fault, kind-hearted and obliging, ever ready with an encouraging word and a helping hand, he became endeared to that community as few men do. The immense throng that waited at the depot, far in the night, for the funeral train, and gathered again along the streets and in the cemetery, where his mortal remains were committed to the dust, while the heavens were hung with black and the clouds dropped their tears, attested the hold he had on the hearts of that people.

When the aged man dies, full of years and honors, "goes down like a shock of corn fully ripe," we are prepared for the event, and there is resignation in our sorrow, for his end is as natural as the falling of the leaves when the autumn winds sweep the forest.

But Mr. CLARK'S sun went down while it was yet noon. In the prime and vigor of manhood, in the midst of life and usefulness, his summons came. And as we looked at his vacant seat in this Chamber, and then into the faces of those sorrowing fatherless children and disconsolate widow, as they again sat down among the familiar scenes of that desolated home; when we remembered how much of love and hope and happiness was wrapped up in his being, and what the possibilities of his future, and how all in so brief a moment had been dashed to the ground, we felt like exclaiming, "How unsearchable are His judgments and His ways past finding out."

On the banks of that beautiful river where for so many years he lived, labored, and loved, he sleeps well, while the garland of earthly honors that bound his brow in life has but changed to a wreath of fadeless beauty in the land beyond the shadows.

When a good man dies we are apt to think the loss to community and the country irreparable and that his place cannot be filled, but the cold waves of Time close over him, others take up the burden that he has laid down, and the great world moves on. It is a reasonable hope, born of the experiences of the past, that the wise Creator, whose foot-prints are seen all along the highways of history, will raise up the men and devise the methods necessary for the accomplishment of His infinite designs, that embrace, as we trust, the highest good and supremest welfare of mankind. This thought helps to reconcile us to the inevitable and presses upon our unwilling attention our own insignificance. He of whom we speak to-day filled his niche in time, and with an abiding faith in Him whose wisdom is over all, whose power protects all, and whose mercy encircles all, "fought a good fight, finished his course." Over the dark billows that now divide us is only the light of the star of Bethlehem, bright with the promise of immortality. To this we finally all come, when every other refuge fails, whether doubting or believing, hoping or despairing, and here at length is the anchor cast, for weal or woe, "when our rest together is in the dust."

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker, less than a year ago, while at my home in Northwestern Iowa, I read in a recently received number of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the memorial addresses in honor of Beverly B. Douglas. Among them was one delivered by RUSH CLARK. I remember in reading his sympathetic words nothing more deeply impressed me than the thought that I could see in his utterances an illustration of that principle in the human mind which leads one in analyzing the character of another to make those elements prominent which constitute the strong points of his own nature. So now, the kindly and noble-souled RUSH CLARK, whose generosity and unselfishness had been proverbial in Iowa for twenty years, emphasized the fact that "the immediate friends of the deceased testified to his goodness of heart and openness of hand." One could also read in this address that the appreciation of a generous public for honorable service and manly effort formed the under-current of his thought, and reflected the inspiring purpose of his own laborious life. In course of his remarks he recited the evidences of respect and attachment to the dead Congressman shown by the people of Virginia, whose attentions and hospitality to the officers of the House and committee of Congress were everywhere manifest on the route from the capital to his former home; and in this connection he said:

At the time expected by the friends, we met them at the village of Mr. Douglas's residence and attended his remains to the church. The entire village seemed to be present to attest their respect for his memory.

As we read these words between the lines, and in the light of subsequent history, they seem to be not only a tribute of respect to the dead, but a half prophecy of like evidences of appreciation at the side of their author's own new-made grave. In less than five months from the day they were spoken, the lips that uttered them were closed in death. It seems almost like a coincidence worked by the hand of Providence that these words thus fitly describe the scene at the grave which so soon opened in the cemetery of that beautiful city of the prairies to receive all that was mortal of the noble and generous-hearted RUSH.

I had met him occasionally during the last nineteen years, and knew him as busy men living one hundred and fifty miles apart sometimes know each other. But on coming to Washington at the beginning of the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, and finding myself occupying a seat nearer him than any other of my Iowa colleagues, as I called upon him day after day for information in respect to the application of rules with which I was unfamiliar, I came to understand more of his character and to more thoroughly appreciate his worth. I also learned why it was that, notwithstanding he was a lawyer of strength and acuteness, a clear and persuasive speaker, a man of unremitting industry and devotion to his duties—so much so that before sending him to Congress his fellow-citizens had chosen him three times to represent them in the State Legislature, where his services had been so conspicuous that he had been elected speaker of the house of representatives for one of these terms—he should still be known all over the State by the familiar and friendly name of RUSH.

Who that hears me to-day has ever known a man possessed of a spirit so generous and a patriotism so exalted as to subordinate his own interests to his friends, his fellows, and his country, that the discriminating and great-hearted public did not learn to express its fondness and favoritism by calling him some pet and familiar name?

But, notwithstanding he was the object of so much love and esteem, his friends could not hold him back from the chilling embrace of Death. And now that we have come to lay the last green sod upon his grave, may we not hope that wife, children, relatives, and friends, who leaned upon him here, and whom he cared for with such unexampled love and tenderness, may find as they continue life's journey that though the way may seem longer and lonelier than heretofore, it will still be smoothed and cheered by fellow-travelers, who in all that constitute a generous manhood and kindly heart are neither more nor less than such, as was our good friend RUSH CLARK.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the relations existing between the late Hon. RUSH CLARK and myself were of the most friendly and cordial character. My acquaintance with him began long before we were associated here as members of this honorable body. He represented a district in which I had many acquaintances and friends, and with portions of which I had been familiar from early manhood. From that fact we were brought into closer and more intimate relations with each other when we became members of the Forty-fifth Congress, and what before had been a pleasant acquaintance ripened into a sincere and confiding friendship. Hence, Mr. Speaker, on this occasion I speak not simply as a eulogist, but as a friend. I desire not merely to do honor to the memory of a deceased member of this body, but to pay a tribute of respect to one whom I regarded with all the feelings and sentiments of a warm and generous friendship.

It is not my purpose to speak at length of the private and public virtues of Mr. CLARK. This has been done, and better done, by his colleagues who have preceded me. I will, however, say that in private life Mr. CLARK was beloved by all who knew him and shared his society and his friendship. In public life he was respected and honored by all associated with him who knew his many virtues and his manly worth. I never knew a man more conscientious and faithful than he in the discharge of a public trust. As a member of this body, I have no doubt but that his fidelity in the discharge of his public duties and the constant, unremitting attention he gave to the many wants and interests of his constituents wore his life away. The arduous labor he performed here at his desk and at his room during the silent watches of the night prepared the way for the successful attack of disease, if it did not induce the very disease of which he died.

He worked more, Mr. Speaker, than he had the strength to work, and no one who intimately knew him could fail to observe that he often seemed to be overworked, overtaxed; yet I can never forget his warm friendly greetings, his cheerful demeanor, and how bravely and uncomplainingly he bore up under the burdens resting upon him as a Representative.

Mr. CLARK was not only a faithful public servant, but he was faithful in all the relations of life. As a counselor and advocate he was able and faithful, and deservedly occupied a high position at the bar of his county and State. As a member of this body, while he took no active part in the debates of the House, yet he was in constant attendance upon its sessions, closely and accurately observed its proceedings, and took a deep interest in them.

I doubt if any man ever brought into the public service as a legislator a more earnest, sincere desire to serve well and faithfully his constituents and his country. As a citizen he took a deep interest in all that pertained to the welfare of the community in which he lived, as well as of his State and nation; and he enjoyed in a high degree the respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens, neighbors, and friends. But, Mr. Speaker, he has obeyed the mandate which sooner or later must come to all of us. He has laid down life's duties, responsibilities, and cares, and is at rest in the cemetery of the beautiful city in which he lived. I confess, Mr. Speaker, when I heard, as I did on the day of his death, that RUSH CLARK was dying I was greatly shocked. It was one of those sudden admonitions which sometimes come upon us, overwhelming us with sorrow and reminding us of the great uncertainty of human life. I had met Mr. CLARK but the evening before his death as we were walking on Pennsylvania avenue. I had a pleasant conversation with him, in which we discussed the probabilities of an adjournment of the extra session of Congress, and we spoke of our anxiety to get home; and now, in a few brief hours, he was dying, he was going home, and there to rest forever. Such is human life.

Mr. Speaker, some poet has truthfully said:

> Death is here, and death is there,
> Death is busy everywhere;
> All around, above, beneath
> Is death, and we are death;
> First our pleasures die, and then
> Our hopes and fears; and when
> These are dead the debt is due;
> Dust claims dust, and we die, too.

Surely those of us who have served here in this Hall for the last few years need no poetic admonition that Death has been here. We know, as we have seen one after another of our fellow-members stricken down, that Death is here; and that no distinctions, no gifts, no honors, however great, can save us from his ruthless hand; when the summons comes we must all obey.

Mr. Speaker, those of us who accompanied the remains of RUSH CLARK to the home he loved so much, and to their final resting-place, could not mistake for a moment the deep hold he had upon the affections of the people among whom he had lived and worked and toiled for so many years. The multitude which in the rain and in the darkness of the night met us on the arrival of the train, and thronged the line of our march from the depot to the residence of the deceased, demonstrated in a remarkable manner the love and respect which the people cherished for a noble citizen and a faithful Representative, and the great sorrow which had been so suddenly visited upon them. I was myself deeply affected at the demonstrations of sorrow which everywhere met us at his home, and by the very general expression of deep and tender sympathy for the grief-stricken wife and fatherless children. I sincerely trust and believe the memory of our departed friend will long be cherished by the people he served so well, and that the God of the widow and the fatherless may keep and bless his bereaved wife and children.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The question being taken on the resolutions they were adopted unanimously; and, in obedience to the fourth resolution, the House (at two o'clock and twenty-seven minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present the petition of Houghton Brothers and others, citizens of Maine, praying that Congress will enact a law at the present session for the distribution of the balance of the Geneva award fund. Mr. BRUCE presented the petition of Rev. A. Jackson, Rev. W.

Robinson, and 75 others, citizens of Greenville, Mississippi, praying for the passage of the bill (S. He also presented the petition of Mattie S. Whitney, of Mississippi, praying compensation for property taken by the United States troops in that State during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAWES. I present a petition signed by Rev. Sheldon Jackson, superintendent of the Presbyterian schools in the Territories, and Rev. John Lanahan, pastor of the Foundry Methodist Episcopal church, in Washington City, in which they represent to Congress that the Territory of Alaska, when purchased by the United States, had a system of education maintained by the Russian government; that upon our taking control of that Territory the whole system expired, and the entire Territory has been left without any means of education; that the present generation is growing up in ignorance and relapsing into barbarism; that the United States is receiving into its Treasury from the Territory every year $317,500, more than 4 per cent. interest upon the original purchase; that it pays back for the benefit of the Territory only $65,000 of this sum, and they pray that out of the $250,000 net revenue received into the Treasury every year from Alaska $50,000 of it may be appropriated for some system of education to those people whom we have obligated ourselves to Russia to provide for in the treaty of purchase. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and I commend it to their careful consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McDONALD presented additional evidence in the case of Gallus Kerchner, of North Vernon, Indiana, praying compensation for stone used in the arsenal building at Indianapolis, Indiana; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I present the petition of D. Ellis Conner and numerous other citizens of Bath County, Kentucky, praying that a pension be granted to Jacob Ginter, of that county, an old and decrepit soldier of the Mexican War. There was, I believe, a bill introduced during the last Congress by my colleague, [Mr. BECK,] granting a pension to Mr. Ginter and to George Oakley. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions, and that the papers relating to these cases be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the same committee. I hope that the committee will act promptly upon this question, for if anything is to be done for these soldiers it had better be done before they go where a pension will do them no good.

Ferrell and others, citizens of Jefferson County, Missouri; the petition of A. P. Pollard and others, citizens of Callaway County, Missouri; the petition of E. T. Todd and others, citizens of Cass County, Missouri; the petition of J. J. McKee and others, citizens of Bates County, Missouri; the petition of J. M. Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the petition of David Gill and others, citizens of Buchanan County, Iowa, praying for an amendment to the patent laws so as to make the manufacturer and vendor alone responsible for infringements; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the petition of Samuel Anderson and others, citizens of Buchanan County, Iowa, praying for the passage of a law to prevent fluctuations in freights and unjust discriminations in transportation charges; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I present the memorial of J. H. Easby and 154 others, Union soldiers in the late civil war, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) for the examination and adjudication of pension claims. I think it right to say, Mr. President, that that bill is now undergoing investigation by the Committee on Pensions, and I am strongly inclined to believe that the memorialists misunderstand both its purpose and its effect in case it should become a law. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNSIDE presented the memorial of R. H. Jackson, captain First Artillery and brevet brigadier-general, United States Army, and Royal T. Frank, captain First Artillery and brevet lieutenant-colonel, United States Army, remonstrating against the passage of the bills now pending in the Senate for the relief of W. A. Winder and Dunbar R. Ransom; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN presented the memorial of J. D. Wood and others and the memorial of John McRae and others, citizens of Illinois and soldiers in the late war, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of J. O. Pickering and others, citizens of Kansas; the petition of Jesse J. Pursell and others, citizens of Pennsylvania; and the petition of W. O. Gleim and others, citizens of Ohio, all soldiers in the late war, praying for the enactment of a law for the equalization of bounties; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of George Myers and others, soldiers of the late war, praying for the passage of the bill (S. No. 1078) to grant increase of pensions in certain cases; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Henry Slaughter, of Effingham, Illinois, praying to be allowed an addition to his pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of George W. Parker, superintendent of the Saint Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad, praying for a reduction of the duty on steel rails; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McDONALD presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of Indianapolis, Indiana, in favor of the establishment of an inland port of entry at Indianapolis, Indiana; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions passed at a meeting of ex-Union soldiers, citizens of Butler, De Kalb County, Indiana, and signed by Abner F. Pinchin, president, and D. D. Diehl, secretary, in favor of the passage of a bill to equalize the pay of the soldiers and sailors of the late war, so that they may be paid the difference which existed between the value of greenbacks and gold at the time of their payment; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HEREFORD. I present certain papers to accompany the bill (S. No. 419) for the relief of the legal representatives of Daniel Bedinger, deceased, and move that they be referred to the Committee on Claims, before whom that bill is pending.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 41) to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and to regulate proceedings before them, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I am also instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 528) to abolish the office of water registrar of the District of Columbia, and to transfer the charge and control of the water supply to the Chief of Engineers in charge of the Washington Aqueduct, to report it adversely. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] who introduced the bill desires that it be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. McPHERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 855) for the relief of Narcissa Gibson, widow of the late Captain Alexander Gibson, United States Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Colonel William Crooks and others, praying that a pension be granted to Lucy Chaska, an Indian widow, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Harriet Flagg, of Dover, New Hampshire, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 702) granting a pension to Mary A. Tindall, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 956) granting a pension to John Hubbell, of Muscatine County, Iowa, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 970) for the relief of Thomas U. Rothrock, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Armstead Goodlow, late of Company E, Twenty-third United States Colored Troops, praying that he may be allowed arrearages of pension from the date of his discharge, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Milton L. Sparr, praying to be granted an increase of pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1193) granting a pension to Milton L. Sparr.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Emma M. Moore, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. McPHERSON subsequently said: I ask that the report in the case of Emma M. Moore be recommitted to the committee, as a member of the committee desires it to go on the Calendar, in order that a bill may be prepared according to the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. McDONALD. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 143) for the relief of Louisa M. Mansfield, to report it adversely. Inasmuch as the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] who introduced the bill, is not in his seat, I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the petition of S. W. Venable, of Petersburgh, Virginia, praying that his claim for captured tobacco be referred to the Court of Claims, and the petition of Dunlap & Crawford, of Louisville, Kentucky, praying that their claim for captured tobacco be referred to the Court of Claims, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from further consideration of the petitions.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1046) granting an increase of pension to the widow of Major Thomas T. Thornburgh, late of the United States Army, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope the bill will not be indefinitely postponed at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 722) granting a pension to Sarah Dayton, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration. No application has been made to the Pension Bureau for a pension. We think the person for whose benefit the bill is presented is pensionable under the law, and the committee do not report bills in favor of any one for a pension who has not made application to the Pension Bureau and been refused.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 797) granting a pension to Henry C. Smith, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am also directed by the same committee to report back the petitions of John Snider and Jesse F. Phares, praying to be allowed pensions. They were both scouts in the Union service during the war. The committee are of opinion, in which I do not concur, that they should not be pensioned, and report adversely upon their applications.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask that the cases be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands they are mere petitions not accompanied by a bill, and consequently they cannot go on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot put a petition on the Calendar. You would have to introduce a bill and have it recommitted.

Mr. HEREFORD. I will ask then that the petitions be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions in order that a bill may be prepared to accompany them, so that the bill when reported may be placed upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petitions have just been reported adversely from the committee.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move that they be recommitted to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to that. The proper course, the Chair thinks, would be to introduce a bill for the relief of these persons and have it referred to the Committee on Pensions, and when the bill should be reported back adversely it could be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The difficulty about that (if I may be pardoned) would be, if this report be adopted, these papers could not be sent to the committee under the rules of the Senate. Therefore the Senator from West Virginia desires the petitions to be sent back for the time being until he may introduce a bill so as not to foreclose the case on the petitions.

Mr. HEREFORD. I did not understand the remark of the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was suggesting why I thought the course the Senator proposed was the proper one in order to enable him to use the papers in support of these claimants' applications for pensions.

Mr. HEREFORD. Then I hope there will be no objection to the petitions going back to the committee or lying on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petitions will be recommitted to the committee if desired. The Chair hears no objection to that course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from West Virginia can introduce a bill afterward and have it referred.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 38) for the relief of Robert Gorthy and Calvin Green, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 658) to amend the act establishing the southern claims commission so as to extend the same to the Indian tribes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 818) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories, reported it with amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 225) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories, to report it adversely and move that it be indefinitely postponed, because the subject is covered by the bill I have already reported.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 600) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories, to report it adversely for the same reason. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1005) for the relief of the widow and children of Dr. Lemuel H. Draper, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 132) granting a pension to Fannie Lull, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 337) granting a pension to James H. Poland, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PENDLETON. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was recommitted the bill (S. No. 605) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment, have directed me to submit a report accompanied by sundry papers and a new bill.

The bill (S. No. 1195) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment was read twice by its title.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to say, by order of the committee, that they have redrafted this bill, taking into consideration the suggestions of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] made the other day upon a similar bill, and have endeavored to make it conform as nearly as possible to the several suggestions that were made, believing that they were well taken. I give notice that I shall at an early day call up the bill, believing that as now drawn it has met all those objections.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Select Committee to make provision for taking the Tenth Census, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1196) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for taking the tenth and subsequent censuses," approved March 3, 1879; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 208) granting a pension to Archibald Nelson and John Nelson, minor children of John Nelson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 382) granting a pension to Ellen W. P. Carter, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 338) granting a pension to Dederick Blanck, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Theodore S. Sayre and others, praying the passage of an act granting a pension to Colonel Peter Claesgans, of Utica, New York, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1197) granting a pension to Peter Claesgans, late lieutenant-colonel of the One hundreth and forty-sixth New York Infantry.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT HEALTH ORDINANCES.

Mr. BUTLER. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 189) legalizing the health ordinances and regulations of the District of Columbia, to report it, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute; and I ask for its immediate consideration. The joint resolution refers to the recent report of the health office, and it is regarded as important that it be acted upon promptly.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution in the morning hour?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear what the amendment is.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Since the adjournment on Thursday, when this matter went over on my suggestion, I have examined the subject and am entirely satisfied that the recommendation of the committee is correct. I see by their amendment they have enumerated the ordinances legalized in a way that everybody can know exactly what it is that we legalize, and I am entirely satisfied to allow the joint resolution to be considered now, under the circumstances of its immediate necessity.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say in regard to the joint resolution that it is very long and on a very important subject; and if enacted into a law it provides very many penalties, I think, upon hearing it read. I should like to have the joint resolution go over until to-morrow, and be printed as it is proposed to be amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. One objection takes it over.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not wish to antagonize the joint resolution, but desire it to go over for the reason just stated.

Mr. BUTLER. As it is a matter of very great consequence to the health of the District, I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to-morrow at the expiration of the morning hour, or at the close of the morning business, to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, and in connection therewith to act upon the substitute reported from the committee.

THE GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. THURMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred various petitions and memorials on the subject, to report a bill for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award.

The bill (S. No. 1194) for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award was read twice by its title.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to give notice that on this day week I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Meanwhile the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say in connection with the report that it is not the unanimous report of the committee. Myself and sundry other gentlemen of the committee do not agree to it.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD. It is a very short bill, and one of public interest.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be printed in the RECORD of to-morrow.

The bill is as follows:

A bill for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an act approved June 23, 1874, entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," be, and the same hereby is, revived, re-enacted, and continued, all the provisions thereof to take effect from and after the approval of this act, except as changed or modified by this act.

SEC. 2. That the number of judges for said court shall be three; and the agreement of two of the judges shall be necessary to decide any question arising before said court.

SEC. 3. That the judges of the court hereby re-established shall convene and organize in the city of Washington as soon as practicable after their appointment; and the court so organized shall exist eighteen months; and all claims provable under this act shall be verified and filed with the clerk of said court within six months from its organization, or they shall be held to be waived and barred. And should it be found impracticable to complete the work of the said court before the expiration of the said eighteen months, the President may by proclamation extend the time of the duration thereof to a period not more than twelve months beyond the expiration of the said eighteen months; and in such case all the provisions of this act shall be taken and held to be the same as though the continuance of the said court had been originally fixed by this act at the limit to which it may be thus extended.

SEC. 4. That so much of the twelfth section of the said act as provides that "no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right or as assignee, or otherwise, in the right of a person or party insured, as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of said court that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses in respect to its or his war risks exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

That any claimant excluded by the provision hereby repealed shall have the like period of time within which to present, file, and prove its or his claim after the passage of this act as he could have had after the passage of the said act if not so excluded; and such claims shall be considered as claims of the first class. And such court shall also consider and allow all claims properly proved, and not included in the first class directly resulting from damage done on the high seas by confederate cruisers during the late rebellion, including vessels and cargoes attacked and taken on the high seas, or pursued by them therefrom, although the loss or damage occurred within three miles of the shore, and whether such claims be made by the original property owner or by an underwriter who paid for such loss or damage, which claims shall be considered as claims of the second class.

SEC. 5. That the judgments rendered by said court under this act shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the money paid to the United States pursuant to Article VII of the treaty of Washington, and the interest accruing therefrom, not expended in payment of claims heretofore proved and allowed under the provisions of said original act and the act extending the time for the filing of claims thereunder, and of expenses under this act.

SEC. 6. Judgments rendered in the first class shall be first paid. If the sum of money remaining after provision for expenses and the judgments in cases of the first class so unappropriated shall be insufficient to pay the claims of the second class in full, they shall be paid pro rata.

SEC. 7. That this act shall not be construed as in any way renewing, extending, or continuing any of the commissions or appointments of judges or officers of the said court of commissioners of Alabama claims issued and made by virtue of said original act.

SEC. 8. That all moneys necessary for the payment of the salaries of the judges and officers authorized by this act, and for the lawful expenses of the said court hereby re-established, are hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; all of which shall be reimbursed out of the said unexpended moneys before any of the judgments rendered under this act shall be paid.

Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 1094) to incorporate the National Education Association be recommitted to the Committee on Education and Labor.

GEORGE HEARD.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 309) for the relief of George Heard, which will only take about one minute, it being a short bill, which was passed by both the Senate and House at the last Congress without any objection, but failed to be received by the President in time for his signature.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that there is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no printed report in the case. A statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office is with the papers in the case, which was furnished on application, in answer to a letter from myself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then let us hear that read; or perhaps the Senator can state the facts. I will take his statement.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state the facts just as they are. Mr. Heard located a land warrant which had been issued to Chester Hebner, upon one hundred and sixty acres of land in Pettis County, Missouri. The papers were sent here to Washington. There was a supposed defect in the assignment of the land warrant. The Commissioner of the General Land Office sent the papers back to Warsaw, to be returned to Mr. Heard in order that the assignment might be corrected. They were burned up early in 1861 in the land office at Warsaw, and Mr. Heard never heard of the transaction until recently, when he applied for a patent and was informed of the action taken and that the land warrant had been burned up. He then paid $200 cash for the entry, and now asks that a duplicate of the land warrant be issued to him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that it is the same land that he wished to enter before?

Mr. COCKRELL. He has paid for the land, and now simply wants another land warrant in lieu of the land warrant which they refused to permit to be located because of this technical defect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF CORPORATION SUITS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1089) to amend section 640 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the removal of suits by corporations, and to make further provision relating to suits by and against corporations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No motion is necessary, the morning hour having passed and the Calendar being under consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not ask that that bill be taken up to-day. It is the desire of myself and several other Senators to make a somewhat critical examination of that bill, and we are not prepared for its consideration now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; I am willing that the bill shall go over under such circumstances. I should like to take it up as soon as I reasonably can inasmuch as it is designed to relieve a good many citizens of the United States from what they consider to be a real grievance in respect of the present law about the removal of suits by corporations. I shall be glad to get it up as soon as I can consistently with the convenience of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest that the Senator can call it up on Wednesday or Thursday of this week.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 905) in relation to writs of error from the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 4, after the word "of," to strike out "the" and insert "any;" and in the same line, after the word "Territory," to strike out "of Dakota;" so as to read:

That a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to the supreme court of any Territory shall lie in criminal cases where the accused shall have been sentenced to capital punishment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "the," in line 6, to strike out down to "court," in line 10, as follows:

Court rendering such judgment shall, by its order, postpone the execution thereof from time to time and from term to term until the mandate of the supreme court in the case is received and entered upon the records of such lower court.

And in lieu thereof to insert "allowance of such writ shall operate as a supersedeas;" so as to read:

And in such case the allowance of such writ shall operate as a supersedeas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next mendment was, in line 16, after the word "shall," to strike out the word "also;" in line 17, after the word "in," to strike out "said," and insert "any;" and in line 19, after the word "have," to strike out "one year," and insert "six months;" so as to read:

This act shall apply to all such cases heretofore tried or determined in any Territory in which the judgment has not been executed; and in all such cases the defendant shall have six months from and after the passage of this act in which to obtain and perfect such writ of error.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add:

SEC. 2. All cases removed from the supreme court of any Territory to the Supreme Court of the United States, as in this act provided, shall have precedence of hearing in said court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill in relation to writs of error to the supreme courts of the Territories in capital cases."

DEFICIENCIES IN CONTINGENT FUNDS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, I move to take up House bill No. 3497.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It comes up as a matter of course when called.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3497) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for furniture, and repairs of the same, for the House of Representatives for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Appropriations, with an amendment at the end of the bill to add:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to meet certain contingent expenses of the Senate, namely:

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, for the fiscal year 1880, $20,000.

For furniture, and repairs of the same, for the fiscal year 1879, $12.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, so that the House of Representatives may know the causes of the deficiency of $20,000, I submit a short letter from the Secretary of the Senate, which I should like to have go in the RECORD with the bill.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, January 28, 1880.

SIR: The necessary expenses of the several select and special committees of the Senate, and a contract made for a new safe in this office, require a larger expenditure than was anticipated for "miscellaneous items."

The amount appropriated for that purpose for the current fiscal year is nearly expended, and it is estimated that an additional sum of $20,000 will be required to meet the demands of the Senate during the balance of the fiscal year. Should the amount estimated be greater than is required, the excess cannot be expended.

Very respectfully,

JNO. C. BURCH,
Secretary United States Senate.

Hon. H. G. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

GOVERNMENT IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also presents the memorial of a public meeting of inhabitants of the District of Columbia on the subject of government in the District.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask that that memorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, a committee appointed by a meeting of inhabitants of the District of Columbia, assembled at Odd Fellows' Hall, in the city of Washington, on the 23d day of January, 1880, by direction of said meeting respectfully present the following memorial:

Your memorialists with respect represent that the act of 21st February, 1871, mutilated popular government in this District by giving the appointment of the governor and one of the branches of the Legislature to the President and Senate, instead of the vote of the people; that the act of June 20, 1874, abolished popular government entirely, and the act of June 11, 1878, declared that abolishment to be permanent.

This legislation was in derogation of common right, in violation of irrepealable law, and subversive of the American system of democratic representative institutions.

It needs no argument to show that citizens of the United States are entitled to self-government, for such is the principle lying at the foundation of all law in every State of the Union.

This right was guaranteed to the inhabitants of this District by the compact between Maryland and the United States, which resulted in the cession of this territory. The Maryland act of cession provided that the jurisdiction of her laws should not cease in this District until Congress should provide for its government, and that body declared in 1801 that the laws of Maryland as they then existed should continue in force, among them being the first and second articles of the declaration of rights: "That all government of right originates with the people, is founded in compact only, and instituted for the good of the whole. Second. That the people of this State ought to have the sole and exclusive right of regulating the internal government and police thereof."

This was a part of the constitution of Maryland, and its adoption by Congress made it a covenant, with the rest of that constitution, between the inhabitants of the District and the United States, which Congress cannot abrogate, and is bound to fulfill.

This guarantee of local government chosen by the people was well understood by the wise and patriotic men who framed and procured the adoption of the Federal Constitution, as was declared by Madison in the forty-third number of the Federalist.

Following out the terms of the compact of cession, and of its covenant with the inhabitants, Congress finding local government existing in the District in the cities of Alexandria, Georgetown, and the levy courts in the counties, maintained these popular institutions, and by one of its earliest acts of legislation created the municipal corporation of the city of Washington, which continued to exist for seventy years.

It is a perversion of terms to hold that the grant by the people of the power to exercise exclusive legislation in this District implies arbitrary authority. This grant of power may not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people. The rights which the inhabitants of the District enjoyed as citizens of Maryland were inalienable; the right to govern themselves, and not to be taxed but by their own consent; and these rights were never delegated to the United States, but specially reserved to the people, their enjoyment being "inestimable to us and formidable to tyrants only."

Long ago Judge Tucker, in his notes on Blackstone's Commentaries, warned his hearers against the dangers of a latitudinous construction of the powers of Congress over this District. He said: "A system of laws incompatible with the nature and principles of a representative democracy, though not likely to be introduced at once, may be matured by degrees, and diffuse its influence through the States, and finally lay the foundation of the most important changes in the nature of the Federal Government."

This language seems prophetic, as the deliberate extinguishment of popular rights here seems designed as an example. Hence it is not solely in the view of common right and valid compact that the question of local government in this District rises to the level of the most important consideration, for it concerns the character of free government at large. With what countenance can the representatives of the American people declare to the world a determination to deprive of the right and benefit of local government a population of 160,000—larger than that of some of the States? To continue this wrong is to proclaim a standing condemnation of the American system of government, and to assert that taxation without representation is just, while obedience is due where no free will exists.

Wherefore the memorialists on behalf of the inhabitants they represent pray that laws may be enacted reorganizing popular government in this District and effecting a complete restoration of the rights of this people as American citizens.

By order of the committee,

THOMAS J. DURANT, Chairman.

Attest:
J. P. KLINGLE, Secretary.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SUSPENSIONS OF THE RULES.

The SPEAKER. The call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions on leave having been concluded, the next business in order are motions to suspend the rules. The Chair will recognize first those gentlemen who have been instructed by their committees to submit such motions, giving the preference to committees over individual members, as has been the uniform practice.

CONTINUATION OF RIVER IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. REAGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to move to suspend the rules so that the House may now pass a bill to appropriate money for the continuance of improvements of certain navigable waters.

The bill, which was read, appropriates as follows:

To deepen the channel of the Susquehanna River, above and below the port of Havre de Grace, and to complete the work commenced in June, 1879, at the Fishing Battery light station, in the vicinity of Spesutic Island, $28,000; for continuing the work on Muscle Shoals, in the Tennessee River, $110,000; and for continuing the work on Davis Island dam, on the Ohio River, $75,000; said appropriations to be available from the passage of this act.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be allowed to make a statement in relation to this bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. REAGAN. I will ask that the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. TALBOTT,] who represents the district in which the first appropriation contained in the bill is to be applied, be allowed to make a brief explanation in relation to that; and then I will yield to other gentlemen to explain other portions of the bill.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Texas designs to yield the floor in that way, he had better modify his motion so as to suspend the rules, in order that the bill may be considered in the House at this time.

Mr. REAGAN. I will submit that motion.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the bill (H. R. No. 4213) to appropriate for the continuance of improvements on certain navigable waters was received and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. REAGAN. I will now yield to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. TALBOTT.]

Mr. TALBOTT. The first part of the pending bill refers to certain improvements in the Susquehanna River, near Havre de Grace. The appropriation is altogether proper and not large in amount. I will state to the House that prior to 1870, running back for ten or fifteen years, there was an annual appropriation for deepening the channel of the river at that point and improving the harbor of that port. My predecessor, Mr. Archer, of Maryland, I think it was, who was a member of the Committee of Commerce, recommended in 1870 that that appropriation be discontinued. The river at that point is about a mile wide, and the appropriation was discontinued on the recommendation of Mr. Archer, because the channel had been deepened to the proper depth at Havre de Grace, to enable vessels to enter that port without difficulty.

Since 1870 nothing has been done for the improvement of the channel at that point, and it has been filled up to a great extent. The report of Major William P. Craighill, the engineer who was authorized to make a survey and estimates for the information of the Committee on Commerce, states that the channel is now only six feet in depth at mean low water. In addition to that we are satisfied that this appropriation of $28,000 is proper, and would come along as a matter of course in the regular river and harbor appropriation bill. But the United States fish commission has seen proper, and wisely, I believe, to select that point for the purpose of fish culture. I ask the Clerk to read the letter of the Fish Commissioner, in which he states that if this appropriation is made at this time, and not delayed until the river and harbor bill is passed, it will advance the fish culture at that point for a year. That is why we ask this appropriation to be made at this time before the regular river and harbor bill is passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES COMMISSION, FISH AND FISHERIES,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1880.

DEAR SIR: Since our conversation last night, I thought that it would be advisable for me to give you more particularly the figures which I then mentioned. I find on reference to the record of the work of last season at Havre de Grace that we procured six hundred and fifteen ripe female shad; that the proportion of ripe fish to the number of fish examined was about one in one hundred and fifteeen. From these six hundred and fifteen female shad we procured nearly thirteen million eggs. If the improvements in the channel which are contemplated are made in time for us to avail ourselves of them this season, I do not see why we cannot procure an average of one hundred ripe fish a day during the six weeks that we operate there. This simple fact will show the importance to us that the work should be done at once. The yield from the operations at Havre de Grace will, without doubt, be increased tenfold. In our increased facilities for transportation, we will be able to stock the streams of the South and Southwest at much less cost and much more effectively than ever before. Although the improvement of the navigation is of great importance to the commerce of Havre de Grace and Port Deposit, yet the immediate carrying out of these improvements is of vast importance to the whole country. When we take into consideration the fact that it takes three or four years for a shad to mature and return to the waters stocked it will show how important the saving of one year's time is. If the appropriation for this work in the neighborhood of Havre de Grace is postponed until the regular river and harbor bill is considered, it will delay the operations for one year, or rather confine us to the hitherto retail business. We have hitherto used in this locality small steam-launches which have been furnished us by the Navy Department, but in two weeks a large steamer constructed for the purpose of carrying on the fish-culture operations will be ready to receive her hatching equipment. Her draught, however, is so much greater than the small launches that we will not be able to use her efficiently at this point.

I hope that you will be able soon to secure action in this matter.

Very truly yours,

T. B. FERGUSON,
Assistant Commissioner.

Hon. ROBERT M. MCLANE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. TALBOTT. I will state that the recommendation of the Fish Commissioner is also indorsed by the engineer who made the survey and estimates.

Mr. FORT. Is this appropriation to be made available immediately?

Mr. REAGAN. It is.

Mr. FORT. Is it in addition to the regular appropriation?

Mr. TALBOTT. No, sir; only an appropriation in advance of the regular appropriation bill for the river and harbor improvements.

Mr. TUCKER. I would inquire what this appropriation is for?

Mr. TALBOTT. It is for deepening the channel of the Susquehanna River in the vicinity of Havre de Grace. Nothing has been done to that channel for some years past, and no appropriation has been asked for the purpose because it has not before been needed.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL.]

Mr. DIBRELL. In regard to the improvement of the Tennessee River, I wish to say that since the extra session of Congress the Secretary of War has taken $101,536 of the money appropriated to improve the Muscle Shoals and has expended it in paying a claim of George Williams, a contractor from the State of Iowa. This expenditure has caused the fund appropriated for this work to run short. Since the 1st of January from fifteen hundred to two thousand men, who had been engaged on this work, have been thrown out of employment. About fifteen hundred of these workmen are still in the neighborhood, and if this appropriation be made available immediately they can at once resume work.

The report of the engineer shows that this work will cost less than one-third of the original estimate, and it can be finished in less than one-half the time originally estimated. The passage of this bill is of the utmost importance for the improvement of the Tennessee River.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] to explain one of the items embraced in the bill.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this bill includes an advance appropriation of $75,000 for the Davis Island dam. The amount which the Secretary of War has estimated will be necessary to complete this dam is, I think, about $225,000. The object of making this advance appropriation of $75,000, as proposed in this bill, is to enable the work to go on without interruption in the interval of time between now and the passage of the regular river and harbor appropriation bill. The engineer in charge says that unless this appropriation be made, so as to enable him to go on with the work, its completion will be delayed for one year at least. Delay in the completion of the work is a serious interruption to the commerce of the river.

Mr. FORT. What river?

Mr. BAYNE. The Ohio River, just below Pittsburgh. The coffer-dams necessary for the construction of the main dam are now out in the channel, and interfere seriously with navigation. They must remain there until the dam is completed, when they will be removed, and navigation will be uninterrupted.

The importance of this work is very great. From the city of Pittsburgh above this dam there go out annually to States bordering upon the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers between sixty million and seventy million bushels of coal. This is an immense trade. These coal fleets are very heavy and their navigation is difficult. It is impossible to navigate them unless the channel be clear. This species of navigation is greatly interrupted so long as those coffer-dams remain where they are.

There is now no money with which to prosecute this work. A million feet of lumber will be required for use very soon. This lumber must come down by the spring freshet or must be delayed until the fall rising. If by withholding this appropriation the procurement of this lumber be delayed until next fall it will take one year more to complete the work than if this appropriation of $75,000 be now made.

This is a unanimous report of the Committee on Commerce, founded upon a recommendation from the engineer in charge of the work. It is an advance of a part of the appropriation we expect to have made for the completion of this dam. I hope that this and the other meritorious measures included in this bill will receive the unanimous support of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LOWE.]

Mr. LOWE. I understand that the War Department and the engineers in charge of the work on the Tennessee River recommend this appropriation. It is the unanimous report of the committee, and merely anticipates the general bill. Former appropriations have been already consumed, how, or why, I know not, but money is now needed for immediate use. If the appropriation is delayed, hundreds of employés now on the river will be dispersed and the contractors put to unnecessary inconvenience and expense. The work is in my district. I wish I had time to discuss it. It is certainly economy for the Government to push forward the work now in progress, that it may be completed at once and the country realize the benefits. I hope the House will adopt the unanimous report of the committee, and pass the bill.

The bill was twice read, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER. There is a clerical error in the bill. The phrase "out of any sums in the Treasury" should be "out of any moneys in the Treasury."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the word "sums" will be struck out and the word "moneys" inserted.

There being no objection, the bill was amended accordingly.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING FOR THIS EVENING.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I move that at the termination of the legislative proceedings to-day the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening, to carry out at that time the resolution heretofore adopted by the House in regard to the address of Mr. Parnell.

The SPEAKER. According to the usual practice, the House when the ordinary hour of adjournment arrives would take a recess until half past seven o'clock in the evening. That has been the practice in regard to services of this character.

Mr. CONGER. But a motion for a recess would not have precedence over a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The Chair, however, recognizes the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. O'CONNOR] because it is in accordance with usage. If there be no objection, the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina will be adopted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask unanimous consent that at the meeting this evening ladies belonging to the families of Senators and Representatives be allowed seats on the floor.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. MCLANE. Mr. Speaker, I desire also to ask by unanimous consent that the committee of reception, Messrs. Joyce, Constantine, O'Brien, and Piet, accompanying Mr. Parnell, shall also be allowed the privilege of the floor this evening.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS FOR PENSION OFFICE.

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I have been instructed unanimously by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to move that the rules be suspended and the bill (H. R. No. 3258) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior and Secretary of War to employ additional clerks for the balance of this fiscal year to expedite the settlement of pension applications, and for other purposes, be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ eighty additional clerks from or after the 1st day of January to the 30th day of June, A. D. 1880, at a salary of $100 per month each, for service in the Pension Department; and that he be, and he is hereby, authorized to rent available room and purchase furniture for the use of said additional clerks, at a cost not exceeding $13,900.

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint seventy additional clerks, forty for the office of the Surgeon-General, at a salary of $83.33½ per month each, and thirty clerks for the office of the Adjutant-General, at a salary of $100 per month each; and purchase furniture for the use of said clerks in the office of the Surgeon-General at a cost not exceeding $1,000; and that said clerks shall be exclusively engaged in preparing and making reports to expedite the settlement of pension applications called for by the Commissioner of Pensions.

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act, to wit: $61,900 for the use of the Pension Department, and $39,000 for the use of the War Department; total, $100,900.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. CONGER. The pending question is on the suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. CONGER. Then let us have the vote.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move the House take a recess until the hour fixed for the reception this evening.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain that motion.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that is not in order under the suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The exact words of the rules are that only one motion to adjourn shall interrupt the motion to suspend the rules. The gentleman is correct, and the Chair, if the point of order is made, will have to sustain it. A motion to take a recess to-day is about equivalent, under the circumstances, to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. Our new rules provide for that, but they are not operating yet. I should like to have a vote on this immediately.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects to the motion and the Chair cannot entertain it. A motion to adjourn would be in order.

The rules were suspended, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, and the bill was passed.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, under authority of the Committee on Rules I am instructed to move that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the report made by that committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to suspend the rules.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know it is the ruling of the Chair that it will require a suspension of rules, and now, in obedience to the order of the Committee on Rules, I move to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the revision of the rules.

Mr. WEAVER. I hope that will be voted down.

Mr. CONGER. Is there any rule for this time regulating the motion to suspend the rules on Monday?

The SPEAKER. There is not; but so much complaint was made at the last session, and as the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union overruled the plan adopted by the Chair as he thinks, and indicated that the Chair should himself take the responsibility under the rule, the Chair has done so during this session, looking to no list, trusting entirely to himself, and exercising the power the House desired he should exercise in as fair and equitable a manner as he is capable of.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say this——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rises to a parliamentary inquiry and the Chair desires to hear him.

Mr. CONGER. I was about to remark as to the decision of the Speaker, that he would first recognize those gentlemen who rise to move a suspension of the rules under instruction from some committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that in the case of the chairman of a committee acting under instructions of that committee, that the greater number represented by him should have preference over the request of a single individual for a suspension of the rules.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say to the Chair under that decision the control of the committees of the House being within the power of the dominant party in this House, it would necessarily follow——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will never do anything of that kind.

Mr. CONGER. I only wish to say that it would necessarily exclude individuals on this side from making any motion to suspend the rules. It would exclude individuals on our side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so far has recognized no political or party division on either side of the House.

Mr. CONGER. It might shut out this entire side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will never allow that to be done.

Mr. CONGER. It would exclude this side on political questions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is entirely safe with the present occupant of the Chair in that respect.

Mr. CONGER. I have no doubt of that; but there is no committee on this side to order a report, and that is just what I wish to come at. [Laughter.] We never could reach a place where a committee represented as the Chair has suggested would not precede any motion from an individual.

Mr. McMILLIN. The Speaker cannot remedy that. If there be any fault, it is the fault of the people for having elected a majority on this side. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the objection of the gentleman from Michigan is a just one in itself, and no doubt the Chair would supplement it with the other rule, which has been adopted, alternating from side to side in recognition of motions to suspend the rules, so that if one political party had been heard in the way suggested, by the report from a committee, the other side should be heard before the same party could be again heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will conform to that, and the gentleman from Michigan will observe that every recognition to-day has been by the unanimous wish of a committee of the House. For instance, the Committee on Pensions was recognized, by its chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to move to suspend the rules and pass a bill coming before the House from that committee by its unanimous recommendation. The gentleman from Texas also submitted a motion to suspend the rules, which also was the unanimous voice of his committee.

Mr. REAGAN. It was.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky, whom the Chair has now recognized, has, by the unanimous request of the Committee on Rules, moved that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the report from the committee on revision of the rules; so the Chair has been led into no partisan decision as will be seen, and it will be his constant study to avoid any such while here.

Mr. CONGER. I make no such charge.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that, but the gentleman is quite right in making the point that he has, because it has given the Chair an opportunity to disavow anything like giving an undue advantage to either side of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I may say that the report in reference to this pension matter was really a report of this side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUSE. Then the gentleman ought to be satisfied.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky now moves to suspend the rules in order that the House may resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 169, noes 25.

Mr. WEAVER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLACKBURN and Mr. WEAVER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 135, noes 34.

Mr. WEAVER called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GILLETTE called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused; and the yeas and nays were refused.

So the motion of Mr. BLACKBURN was agreed to, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question before the committee is the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I object. I desire to say a word in reference to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The discussion is closed upon that amendment; but immediately after the committee shall have disposed of the amendment now pending, offered by the gentleman from Ohio, another amendment will be in order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which was pending when this subject was under consideration before, has not yet been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. MULDROW. I desire to ask information as to the exact status of the questions now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] proposed an amendment to the original text of the report, and thereupon the gentleman from Mississippi proposed a substitute for that text. According to parliamentary practice in this House, and everywhere else, so far as the Chair is informed, the question is first taken upon the proposed amendment to the text, because the friends of the text have the right to perfect it before they can be called upon to vote upon a substitute for it.

The question is first upon the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Ohio to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and, that having been disposed of, the question will then recur upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FINLEY. Let the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on a mere pro forma amendment to strike out the last word.

The pro forma amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask if it is now in order to offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. SPEER. Then I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no general legislation shall be incorporated in the appropriation bills by the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. If that is offered as an amendment to the one offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it is in order.

Mr. SPEER. I offer it as an amendment to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. This is proposed as a proviso to the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Chairman, upon my amendment I desire to offer a few reflections to the House. I regret I had not contemplated that the rules would be taken up this morning, or I should have endeavored to have systematized what I desire to say upon this subject. I think, Mr. Chairman, that one of the most fruitful causes of difficulty under our system of Government is the practice of tacking general legislation on the appropriation bills. It is an illogical thing in itself. An appropriation bill, as its name imports, should be a bill to appropriate money, but for no other purpose.

What is the effect of this legislation? It is, sir, to produce a conflict between the independent and co-ordinate branches of our Government. As every schoolboy knows, there are separate departments, each independent of the other. Sir, this practice destroys that independence. If in the Committee on Appropriations it is thought proper to tack general legislation on the appropriation bills, if the Senate does not agree to that general legislation, or if the President does not see fit to approve it, the appropriation bill will fail, and as a consequence the money necessary to sustain the vast and beautiful structure and fabric of our Government is refused. There is no telling at what time this contingency may arise. There is no telling the alarming consequences which may ensue from it. Public distrust of our securities at home and abroad; breaches of faith on the part of the Government to its employés; the distress of thousands dependent on that good faith for their livelihood; an unprotected frontier; a dismantled Navy; a disbanded Army—these are some of the possible fruits of "riders" of general legislation on the appropriation bills.

Sir, all the parties have been at fault upon this subject. So far as my investigation extends the first time it was done it was done at the instance of the republican party in the year 1856, when a proviso was placed on the Army appropriation bill that the troops should not be used in Kansas. The republican party and the democratic party have followed and adopted that exceedingly bad precedent; and we have at times witnessed emergencies when it seemed that the very existence of the Government was threatened because of a possible failure of the appropriations necessary to sustain it.

Gentlemen have fallen into the mistaken idea that our system is like that of the British government in regard to the granting or refusing of supplies by Parliament as a means of control over the Crown. That is not true. It cannot be demonstrated logically that a refusal of the necessary means to carry on this Government is a legitimate parliamentary resort. Congress is obliged to vote the money to sustain the judges, to sustain the executive department, to sustain the legislative department, to sustain the Army and Navy, or else the Government goes to pieces. And, sir, this result may be brought about at any time by party feeling if general legislation is permitted to be attached to appropriation bills.

Take one instance. The Constitution of our country declares that the judges shall receive for their services salaries which shall be paid at stated intervals, and which shall not be diminished during their term of office. Now, you tack a rider, as it is called, on the bill to make judicial appropriations. The bill is not passed because of that rider. And what is the effect of it? You do not have the money necessary to pay the judges. They cannot get their monthly payments. The payment of their salaries is postponed. The consequence is you in effect diminish their salaries; you not only deprive the gentlemen who hold those important positions of their vested legal right to their salaries, but you practically cripple and dishonor the judicial department of the Government. It is impossible to conceive all the calamitous consequences which may ensue under our form of government, where Congress votes all the money required to maintain it, if the appropriations should be refused because of this dangerous practice of tacking riders on the appropriation bills.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] a day or two since, in the progress of this debate, declared that no committee of this House except the Committee on Appropriations at the close of any given Congress was without business on its table; that the Committee on Appropriations was the only committee which discharged itself from everything on its docket. Now, sir, that probably is true, and yet the statement should not go entirely without challenge. The reason why every committee heretofore has seen Congress adjourned with unfinished business on its table was, that after the first two months of any given session there never was more than one call of the committees, and therefore the business of each committee was compelled to lie unfinished on its table; while the Appropriations Committee, under the same code of rules, had the right to report at any time.

Now, sir, the Committee on Appropriations should undoubtedly have the right to report at any time, because its business is of the first and greatest importance. But that is the reason, and the only reason, that that committee has been able to discharge its duties. Under this report of the Committee on Rules it will have no practical advantage over any other committee in this House. Every committee will be called at least as often as once a week, and I fully believe that the trouble which the gentleman from Kentucky complained of will be entirely cured, and that no committee of the House at the close of a Congress will leave unfinished business on its table. So far the new rules will give all the committees of the House a fair chance.

As regards the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER,] I did not find it on examination to be so radical and so sweeping as I supposed it to be. I know the gentleman is one of the most conscientious legislators in this House, and I believe he is actuated but by one desire: that is, to promote legislation in the Congress of the United States. But I do sincerely hope that the proposition he makes will not be adopted.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] has just made a proposition amendatory to that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is that the Appropriations Committee shall have no power of legislation. Now, sir, if that is adopted as an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it might just as well be a substitute for the proposition of that gentleman; because, that being adopted, the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is without reason and without necessity.

I ask the gentleman from Georgia to look at page 38 of the report of the Committee on Rules; and I call his attention and the attention of the House to clause 3 of Rule XXI and to the last clause of that clause 3:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

I ask the gentleman from Georgia whether to strike out that last clause will not effect all that he desires to effect; if it will not leave to the Committee on Naval Affairs the right to recommend to this House all laws necessary for the establishment of the Navy; to the Committee on Military Affairs the right to recommend to this House all laws touching the organization of the Army; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs the right to recommend to this House all laws touching foreign matters or matters connected with our diplomatic corps; whether the various committees of this House will not be in a position to recommend to this House all of the legislation coming within the jurisdiction of each particular committee; and if that is not all that the committees of this House desire, if it is not all that the gentleman from Georgia is seeking? If that is the case, I hope the House will not agree to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and that the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw his amendment and offer it again when that section 3 of Rule XXI is reached by moving to strike out the words to which I call his attention.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The other day when the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the other side of the House [Mr. WHITE]——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that debate has been exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I was going to make a parliamentary suggestion only. It was agreed the other day that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] should go over until the third clause of the twenty-first proposed rule should have been reached. The proposition of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] relates to that same clause, and it seems to me that he would act wisely if he would allow his amendment also to go over, reserving until that time every right he is now possessed of.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to state, if I am in order, that what I wish to accomplish is that there shall be an affirmative declaration in the rules that the Committee on Appropriations shall not tack general legislation on the appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order, but the Chair will recognize the gentleman to respond to the suggestion in relation to the order of proceedings.

Mr. SPEER. I understand that debate is not in order. At the suggestion, however, of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules [the Speaker] I will withdraw my amendment, reserving my right to offer it when the third clause of Rule XXI shall have been reached.

Mr. ACKLEN. I desire to offer as a proviso to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER,] and as an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MULDROW,] that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order.

Mr. ACKLEN. I offer it as an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. There is already pending an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. ACKLEN. I understood that that was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment which was withdrawn was one to the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER.]

Mr. ACKLEN. Then I offer this as an amendment in place of the one which has been withdrawn.

Mr. FRYE. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to assert that the amendment of the other gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] was by agreement allowed to go over?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that that was a different amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I alluded to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WHITE.

Mr. FINLEY. It was also understood that the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] went over with the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. ACKLEN. I think there is a misunderstanding. I was not under the impression that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] had been withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not withdrawn.

Mr. ACKLEN. Then let the amendment which I offer be attached to that as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER,] and which was pending when the Committee of the Whole last had this subject under consideration, is still pending.

Mr. ACKLEN. And to that I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Several days before that a gentleman from Pennsylvania offered an amendment, which was withdrawn for the time being.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] offered an amendment, which was withdrawn.

Mr. ACKLEN. It is to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] that I desire to offer my amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. An amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] is not now in order, for the reason that there are already two amendments pending thereto. At the time the committee rose on Thursday last the proposition then pending for action was the substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MULDROW.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will be glad to be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time the committee rose there was an amendment pending proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER,] and an amendment to that amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] There was also pending an amendment in the nature of a substitute, proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MULDROW,] and there was pending an amendment to that substitute. This morning the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] has been disposed of by the committee. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] now proposes an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER,] which is in order.

Mr. MULDROW. I would like to inquire what was the amendment which was pending to the substitute which I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. A pro forma amendment, to strike out the last word.

Mr. ACKLEN. I ask that my amendment to the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, This shall not be construed to include the river and harbor bill, which the Committee on Commerce shall have power to report at any time to the House for consideration.

Mr. ACKLEN. Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] the different appropriation bills coming from the various committees are to be reported first to the House and then committed to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations is then to report those bills back, modified as it may see fit, changed as it may deem necessary, and the bills are then to be left for some member of the Committee on Appropriations to take charge of.

Now, I do not deem it necessary to state what I have already stated to this committee, that I do not think the river and harbor appropriation bill should come under the same construction of the rules as the other general appropriation bills. It is an anomalous bill. It is not a bill that can be properly referred to the Committee on Appropriations for consideration. When the Committee on Commerce shall have matured and perfected that bill, after long months of consideration of the various reports of the Engineer Department, the Committee on Appropriations cannot possibly take the time to consider that bill with any degree of care and accuracy, or with any degree of proper attention to the interests and welfare of the Government. They may cut off appropriations; they may reduce the sum total of the bill; but in so doing they may work such injury to the general interests of the Government as will more than counterbalance the reduction of expenditure.

Under these circumstances, I think that, should it be the sense of this committee to adopt the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr SHALLENBERGER,] and I am frank to say that, after careful consideration of that amendment, I am rather favorably impressed with it—they should adopt a proviso, that so far as the amendment affects the general appropriation bills it shall not include the special bill known as the river and harbor bill; for this is an anomalous bill and cannot properly come under the same rule which it is proposed to apply to the other bills.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ACKLEN. Certainly.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will not the question which the gentleman is now discussing come up appropriately upon clause 7? It seems to me the precise point which the gentleman is seeking to cover will be brought up upon clause 7 by the amendment which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] proposes to offer. As I understand, this is not the time or place to bring up that discussion. My amendment suggests nothing whatever in reference to the river and harbor appropriation bill or the jurisdiction of the Committee on Commerce. That question can be appropriately acted upon, and the Committee on Commerce can be excepted from the operation of my amendment when we come to consider clause 7, if such be the desire of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ACKLEN. All that the gentleman says is very true, if it shall be deemed that the river and harbor bill is not one of the general appropriation bills. But in order to prevent any possible misconstruction of the rule in this respect I desire that the good faith of gentlemen who support the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall be shown in adopting this proviso. Therefore I have offered it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended, until the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] was submitted, to take any part in this protracted discussion, for I am conscious that I am not so profoundly learned in parliamentary law and practice as to give any very great value to my opinions and judgment upon subjects so intricate and difficult of comprehension. I should, therefore, have withheld the views which I propose to submit did I not conceive that two most important questions are involved in this amendment and one or two others of a somewhat similar character which have been offered, together with the discussion which has followed. The one is the proposition to withdraw almost entirely from the Committee on Appropriations the supervision and guardianship which it has always by law exercised over the expenditures of the Government. And the other is the proposition to limit in some measure the almost absolute and aggressive power which that committee has heretofore possessed, and sometimes, I think, exercised to control legislation upon the floor of the House.

These questions are both important, but widely different in their character, and require, in my judgment, a very different action by the House. The former proposition is fraught with the extremest danger to the public interest, and ought to be rejected, while the latter is eminently just and proper and should be promptly accepted and adopted.

There are, I think, few members of this House who have had more cause, real or imaginary, of complaint against the Committee on Appropriations than I have had, though I am glad to number every member of it among my personal friends; and few members, I presume, are more willing than I am to curtail and impose every restraint upon that absolute dominion which has heretofore been allowed it in the management and direction of public legislation upon the floor of this House, yet I would not do this at the peril of the public interest. I know, sir, whenever we relax that rigid grasp which the Appropriations Committee can alone keep upon the purse-strings of the Government, whenever we wrest from it the key of the national Treasury, we will at once enter upon a vast field of public expenditure that has no bounds, and embark upon a turbid ocean of public extravagance which will soon swallow up our entire public resources.

The tendency of all governments is to extravagance in their administration, as they advance in age and increase in power, extent, and wealth; and ours, without the wisest legislation and most watchful care, will, I fear, prove no stronger or more fortunate in this respect than others, and especially is this apprehension well founded in view of the fact that a large public sentiment in very many sections demands a liberal disbursement of public moneys, and the whole country is wont to look with indifference upon public extravagance. The annual cost of administering our Government has already reached a magnitude alarming to the more thoughtful of our people, and unless every proper restraint is imposed it will increase in a ratio greatly disproportioned to our legitimate public needs. In order that this restraint may be exercised wisely, uniformly, and efficiently, and that all our public expenditures may be always subject to the scrutiny and supervision of some committee charged with that special duty, I would let the Appropriations Committee retain that power, under the control of the House. I would let that committee examine and revise the estimates and details of every bill making an appropriation of public money, compare the demands of the different bills, add to or take from them any amount deemed proper, and apportion properly the aggregate sum asked for in all of them, and then submit, through its members, its views to the House for action. Beyond this I would not allow it to go; certainly not to the extent it has heretofore gone, of excluding every other committee from the floor whenever it saw proper to do so, and granting the privilege of discussion according to the preferences or caprices of its members.

I protest against the longer continuance of this arbitrary and despotic sway, and hence I urge the adoption of this amendment as the most efficient and least harmful method that now occurs to me, of opposing and battling against it. This does not invite extravagance or tend to increase expenditures, nor does it in any other way endanger the public interest, but on the contrary, as I think, it provides additional safeguards against the very evils it is thought it is calculated to bring about; for by the arrangement which it proposes every committee of the House will feel something of the high responsibility which attaches to the Committee on Appropriations, and, besides this, it would disarm a good deal of that hostility which is too often manifested toward it. And a still stronger reason why this amendment should be adopted is found in the fact that it would more equally and more justly distribute the privileges of debate, and relieve in some measure many members from a disadvantage under which they have heretofore labored, and give them an opportunity of being heard sometimes in discussion, without begging that favor from others. Parliamentary law is tyrannical at best, and anything we can do, compatible with the public interest, to divest it as far as possible of this feature, should be done.

It has very often occurred to me that the rules governing this House constitute a labyrinth of parliamentary difficulties in which a new or modest member may remain lost to the ear of his constituents and the country during his entire official life, and from which he can never emerge, save by the friendly aid of the presiding officer. Sometimes it has seemed to me that they must have been designed to and did form as a whole a network of mysteries, interwoven with absurd technicalities and legal contradictions, which can alone be interpreted and understood by whoever chances to occupy the chair, and under cover of which such occupant may strike down every one he chooses, and hold in absolute dependence to his will the representative right of every member on this floor to be heard whenever he chooses to speak upon any subject of legislation.

No law-giver or legislative body ever formed a code or system of laws which was calculated to bestow upon any one man more enlarged, absolute, and despotic power than is conferred by our rules as they formerly existed, so far as they may extend upon the Speaker of this House, or any one else who may preside in his place; for by a recent interpretation of them by the Committee on Rules, and by the House after considerable discussion, it was declared that he could in his own absolute official discretion say who should and who should not speak upon this floor.

In that discussion it was said, and very truly too, by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that the presiding officer must necessarily be invested with a very enlarged discretion in the recognition of members who desire to speak upon any question, but the power allowed him under the construction that seemed to be agreed upon by the House then can scarcely be called a discretion, even of the utmost latitude; it can be called nothing less than an absolute and irresponsible despotism.

If an autocrat had prepared these rules for his government, to be construed and applied by himself, he could not thus have retained in his own hands greater power, short of confiscation of property or taking of liberty and life, than is given to the Speaker of the House and the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House. It is not therefore surprising that rules thus constructed must necessarily have fallen very far short of giving entire or even partial satisfaction to a majority of members, and however fairly and justly the presiding officer may have endeavored to apply them, many abuses would of course spring up and great injustice in many individual cases be inflicted.

Upon the discussion of every important question it is only natural and reasonable that many members desire to give expression to the views which they may entertain. But it is not possible for a presiding officer to give recognition at the same moment of time to every member who may seek it, nor perhaps is it possible on all occasions for him to recognize within the entire time prescribed for debate upon any particular measure every one who desires to speak upon it. It would seem, however, that it is possible, and eminently just, too, for every member of the House who wishes it to be heard some time during a whole session. And it also seems to me possible for that time to be known and designated with sufficient certainty to prevent its exclusion from that class of events the occurrence of which no human wisdom can foretell. Many methods by which it was thought a fairer and juster application of the rules in the respect of which I have been speaking could be brought about have been suggested, and some of them have been adopted and acted upon for a time; but they all seem to have been abandoned, and we are back again at the discretion of the Speaker.

Once it seemed to be the rule for gentlemen on most occasions to be recognized by the Speaker from the right around to the left, as they respectively arose. This usage had its difficulties and inconveniences, and did not long survive. Then the custom was adopted of allowing members who wished to be recognized to enter their names upon a list kept at the Speaker's desk, and to obtain the floor as their names were reached. This arrangement seemed at first to be as fair and just a one as could be made, but it was very soon made manifest that there were some grave objections which might be urged against it with great force. Sometimes it appeared that the making up of the list stimulated a race diligence, and that certain gentlemen, by reason of their superior industry, strict attention to business, or good fortune, invariably succeeded in getting their names entered high up on the list; or, failing by any chance to do this, there was generally found some friendly hand which, by the simple process of interlineation, made their names appear at any desired point on the list.

And then again, when these methods failed to give entire satisfaction, by reason of some gentlemen who may have been number 90 in the preparation of the list being made number 2 or 3 by the interlining dodge, complaint was made, the old list was canceled and a new one made out; then would follow such an unseemly and indecorous scramble to reach the Clerk's desk first as might reasonably give rise to the apprehension that members of Congress are, in moments of temporary excitement, liable to forget the dignity of the body and the proprieties which should attach to the transaction of its public business.

So this expedient was abandoned, and on a recent occasion all written lists were destroyed and a mental one prepared by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole to suit himself, which was kept in his mind during a protracted debate. As it is said that a judicial judgment or decree remains in the breast of the court until pronounced, so I suppose it may be said that the chairman on the occasion referred to kept his list of speakers in his breast, as it was not visible anywhere else.

During the recent exciting and important debate upon the Army and the executive, legislative, and judicial appropriation bills at the late extra session the system of unlimited discretion to the Speaker, which we seem to have adopted, operated most unjustly and unequally, not only as to individual members, but in respect to sections and States, which has been the subject of much very just complaint.

My own experience in an effort to get the floor during that debate, together with some other incidents which I shall mention, will perhaps enforce my argument against the longer continuance of the despotic rule I have referred to quite as strongly as any other illustrations which I could select.

While the Army bill was under discussion, and while I was confined to my room by a severe illness, a member on the other side took occasion to refer to me, and the means by which he alleged I secured a seat upon this floor, in a manner exceedingly unjust, not to say offensive to me, and without the warrant of a single fact by which such a statement could be justified. When I saw this attack upon me printed in the RECORD the day after it was made, I of course felt called upon to reply to it, and determined to seek the first opportunity to do so. Accordingly, as soon as my health permitted me to leave my room and some days before the executive, legislative, and judicial bill had been reported to the House, I appealed to the courtesy of my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to give me a few minutes of the time, to which he as mover of the bill was entitled, in which to make such reply as I could, but unfortunately I had been forestalled, as he informed me, even at that early day by other gentlemen to whom he had given all the time allowed him. I next had recourse to enrolling my name upon the list of those who desired to speak, then kept at the Speaker's stand, in the hope that I might be reached some time in the progress of the debate, though I was rather far down toward the end of the list, but this hope was destroyed by the destruction of the list.

I then resorted to an appeal to the "discretion" of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, informing him in detail of the particular reasons why I desired to speak, and requested him to exercise his "discretion" in recognizing me for a short time at some convenient period of the discussion; but he informed me that his discretion had reached its utmost limit in that direction, though I believe it did afterward become sufficiently elastic to embrace several other gentlemen who made application some time later.

Failing in every other effort to secure the floor, I sought it through the kindness of a number of friends, who I thought might possibly in some way or other be fortunate enough to find more favor in the discretion of the chairman than I had been able to obtain; but unfortunately I met disappointment again, for I found that all my friends with whom my relations were such as to render it proper for me to ask so friendly an act at their hands, like myself, had been omitted from the list of speakers mentally prepared by the chairman.

My individual grievance is a matter of no concern to the House, only in so far as it may occur to every other member as well under the operation of the same rule. I had thought it was a parliamentary courtesy of uniform observance in every legislative body that whenever a personal attack was made upon a member in public debate the member so attacked should be accorded the floor to reply; but in my case this particular character of parliamentary courtesy was not considered one of the elements proper to limit or direct the somewhat extraordinary discretion with which we had at that time clothed our parliamentary autocrats. I was also informed that there was a general understanding and agreement by which those who had not spoken upon the Army bill should be recognized in preference to those who had. But this rule was not observed any more than the other supposed requirement I have mentioned.

An examination of the list of those who addressed the House upon the executive, legislative, and judicial bill at the last session shows a very striking preponderance of speakers from some States over others. The following figures represent about the number of members from each State who spoke upon this bill:

One each from the States of Arkansas, Oregon, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Maryland, Maine, New Jersey, and Michigan. Three from Massachusetts, two from Alabama, four from North Carolina and New York, three from Louisiana, two from Illinois, five from Ohio and Iowa each, six from Indiana, three from Mississippi, three from Wisconsin, six from Missouri, ten from Pennsylvania, and five from Kentucky, while only one member from Tennessee (though there were three members from that State who desired to speak) was fortunate enough to be heard.

The chosen one from my own State is one of the cleverest as well as ablest of our delegation, but, with the exception of myself, he is also the most modest of our members, and I can no more account for his good fortune than I can for the accident of the favor shown Tennessee being increased ten for Pennsylvania and five fold for Kentucky.

It is not at all impossible that there is more talking done in Congress upon every measure of legislation than is absolutely necessary for the prompt and intelligent transaction of public business, and more, too, than is desired by the people we represent; but neither members nor their constituents are entirely willing that the will of one single individual shall control the whole matter.

Now, in what I have said I distinctly disclaim the purpose of reflecting in the slightest degree upon any gentleman who has ever occupied the chair either as Speaker or chairman of the Committee of the Whole House. I am not condemning any presiding officer, but simply denouncing a vicious and tyrannical rule, under which it is scarcely possible for any one occupying the chair, however fair and just he may desire to be, to avoid many abuses and to abstain from many partial and unjust rulings.

It is therefore to relieve the presiding officer from embarrassment and the ungracious task of discriminating between those having equal rights upon the floor and equal claims upon his country that I urge some change in our rules, as well as for the purpose of relieving members from the humiliation and loss of self-respect which must come from being obliged to fawn upon whoever may chance to be in the chair in order to propitiate his favor.

Perhaps the method which I suggest is not the best one to cure the evil complained of, but if it is not I have no doubt but that the wisdom of the Committee on Rules will devise a better and more effectual one, and I commend the subject to their immediate and careful consideration before their report now under discussion shall be finally acted upon. It is possible that much of what I have said might have been omitted as not being strictly germane to the particular subject upon which I arose to speak, but in the hasty examination which I have made of the revision of the rules which we are now considering, to say whether or not the evils of which I have spoken have been provided against.

If they have not, they will almost certainly be continually presenting themselves again to vex and harass those who have heretofore suffered from their existence. But, however this may be, it is certain to my mind that the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and upon the adoption of which I am insisting, will relieve us from evils almost as great and quite as unnecessary as those which have heretofore been inflicted under the arbitrary and untrammeled power possessed by the Speaker or other presiding officer, for the powers and prerogatives which it is proposed to accord to the Committee on Appropriations, under the new rules, are quite as broad and despotic. These we can limit at best to such an extent as not to have the powers of every other committee and every member of the House at the mercy and unbridled discretion of the Committee on Appropriations, so that we will at least impose some restraint upon one despotism, if we do have to submit to another. I desire again to say that I am not complaining of any one who has ever on any occasion occupied the chair of the presiding officer. I am only denouncing a tyrannical and despotic system of rules, under which the greatest wrongs may be perpetrated.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish to offer a pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is in order until one of those now pending has been disposed of.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I am glad to have a vote.

The question recurred on Mr. ACKLEN'S amendment to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 79.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. SHALLENBERGER'S amendment.

Mr. REED. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. REAGAN. The question is first on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated the rule to be, and he believes it universal, that where a substitute is proposed for the original text, the original text must be first perfected before the vote is taken on the substitute. The gentleman from Maine moves to strike out the last word, an amendment which has already been made and rejected by the committee.

Mr. REED. I move to strike out the word before the last.

Mr. CHALMERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and that is whether the pro forma amendments cannot be stopped by being objected to?

Mr. REED. I move to strike out the word before the last; not the last word, but the word before the last—an amendment of which I am the originator. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out a different word, and is in order.

Mr. REED. I desire by striking out that word, or by the aid of it, to call the attention of the House to what to me seems to be the purpose we wish to arrive at, if we can. Our object, if I understand it, is to prevent legislation on the appropriation bills. Now, the amendment which was suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SPEER,] and I ask his attention to it, only provides that the Committee on Appropriations shall not introduce any legislation into their bills. The difficulty we have had to contend with is not that the Committee on Appropriations alone introduced legislation, but that every member of the House was entitled to introduce legislation if he could convince the temporary chairman that it was a reduction of expenditures, and sometimes I have noticed temporary chairmen were very easily convinced. If we succeed in making the modification suggested by my colleague, namely, the striking out of the exception to a subsequent rule, we shall have arrived at this state of affairs in this House—that is, no amendment can be offered to an appropriation bill which is not already provided for by exsiting law; no amendment can be made by anybody, and therefore no legislation can go on the appropriation bills except by unanimous consent. Hence, unless we have unanimous consent, all legislation will have to be passed upon by appropriate committees.

I hope, therefore, we shall vote against this amendment in order to reach the proposition suggested by my colleague, which, in my judgment, will rid the appropriation bills of very objectionable features. I call attention to it now because I think the matter cannot be too often presented to the House. I am satisfied that when the House once understands the situation of things it will do away with a provision which, however useful and valuable when presented, has long ceased to be anything else than an obstruction to the business of the House.

Mr. REED'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER,] I wish to know whether he will not offer an amendment to it regulating the right of the Committee on Appropriations in the matter of the division of time in the discussion of bills which may be referred to that committee and reported back to the House. No one can know what the vote of the House will be, and, if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to be adopted, I am satisfied there is not a gentleman who would not give at least a fair division of time, an equal opportunity to be heard, parceling it out equally between the two committees, which would then be before the House on trial with their several reports.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, which announced the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 3497) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for furniture, and repairs of the same, for the House of Representatives for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, with amendments; in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced the passage of the following bills; in which concurrence was requested:

An act (S. No. 309) for the relief of George Heard; and

An act (S. No. 905) in relation to writs of error to the supreme courts of the Territories in capital cases.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER.]

The Clerk read as follows:

But in the debate on such bill, it shall be divided equally between the committee having charge of such bill and the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I ask for a division on that amendment, as there are two substantive propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be again read.

The amendment to the amendment was again read.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I desire to vote separately on it. While there may be objection to the former——

The CHAIRMAN. As the question is on the adoption of that proposition as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, of course there will be a separate vote on it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not understand the gentleman wants a division of my amendment, but a vote on that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The Committee on Rules has never instructed in favor of that amendment, but it is offered——

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is offered by me in my individual capacity.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I have no serious objection if it shall come in in the right place; but supposing that to be adopted, then the question will be on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) And the whole might then be voted down, while on a separate vote only one might be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course if the amendment to the amendment is adopted the vote then comes upon the amendment as amended, but if it be voted down all will be voted down.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will solve the trouble. I want to get a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I did not, however, wish to adopt that amendment and leave to one committee of the House all rights in the matter of debate and time, and to the other, which was equally responsible before the House, none at all. Thinking we had better have the vote, as we have discussed this question enough, I will withdraw my amendment to the amendment for the time, and let the vote be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I renew the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish to say to the gentleman that he need not be uneasy, for if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be voted down I will then offer this as an amendment.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I wish to say a few words for fear the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not be adopted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. You can offer it again as an independent proposition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Has not the debate been exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. Not on the amendment which has been renewed, the gentleman from Kentucky having withdrawn it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not understand the gentleman from Tennessee insists on renewing my amendment.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I withdraw it.

The question recurred on Mr. SHALLENBERGER'S amendment.

Mr. FRYE. This is an important amendment, and therefore I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SHALLENBERGER and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 90.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question next recurred upon a pro forma amendment to Mr. MULDROW'S substitute.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. MULDROW'S substitute.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 83.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONEY. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

In debate on appropriation bills the time shall be divided equally between the Appropriations Committee and the committee in charge of general legislation upon the particular public service for which the proposed appropriation is reported.

Mr. GARFIELD. What about the other members who do not belong to either? What about their rights?

Mr. MONEY. I do not suppose they will have any less power than they have now.

Mr. GARFIELD. That will give no time but to two committees.

Mr. MONEY. I suppose other members of the House will have as much privilege then as they have under the present rule, when the committee consumes the whole time.

The committee divided; and the amendment was rejected, 16 only voting in the affirmative.

Mr. BAYNE. I move the following amendment:

Amend clause 3 by adding the words "and the several appropriation bills, when reported to the House by the committees in which they originated, shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, to be reported back to the House after due consideration, with such recommendations as the general expenditures of the Government require them to make, and the committee in which the bill originated shall thereupon have charge of it, and upon its passage, and the time shall be equally divided between such committee and the Committee on Appropriations."

Mr. CLYMER. Both these propositions have been voted down.

Mr. BAYNE. No, sir; both propositions have not been voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken in saying they have been voted down. The gentleman from Kentucky offered an amendment, but withdrew it. This differs from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as it contains on its face also the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBESON. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it means that the time shall be equally divided between the committees or whether the two committees shall have equal right of discussion, leaving the rest of the House to their rights.

Mr. BAYNE. I mean the two committees shall have equal right.

Mr. ROBESON. Because the proposition, as I understand it, gives the whole time to the two committees.

Mr. BAYNE. No, sir; it is not intended to give the whole time to two committees.

Under our present system of rules one committee does monopolize the discussion on this floor when appropriation bills come up. That is an observation which will occur to every man who has carefully noticed the course of legislation in this House upon such subjects.

The amendment desires simply to effect this purpose—that other gentlemen and other committees may have equal opportunities with the Committee on Appropriations to discuss these measures If that amendment should be adopted it is apparent the Committee on Appriations will still have one-half of the time devoted to the discussion of every proposition that emanates from every committee of this House which makes appropriations. It will still have an opportunity of monopolizing the floor to a large extent.

Mr. BROWNE. Will not your proposition lead to extravagance if you allow other committees to divide the discussion of appropriation bills with the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BAYNE. That, Mr. Chairman, is a reflection on the other committees which I am not willing to concede. I am disposed to think that the other committees, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Military Affairs, and others, have just as economical views as the Committee on Appropriations. But I cannot, for my part, see why one committee should monopolize legislation in this House, having the power to exclude amendments offered by any member of the House. I am in favor of dividing this thing up; and this amendment gives to other committees the right to share with that committee to the extent of one-half of its privileges in this respect.

The question being taken on Mr. BAYNE'S amendment, there were—ayes 35, noes 90.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to clause 3 the following:
And when bills are reported by said committee it shall only be entitled to one-half the time allowed for discussion.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 54, noes 70.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of Rule XI, and read the following:

4. To judicial proceedings, civil and criminal law: to the Committee on the Judiciary;
5. To banking and currency: to the Committee on Banking and Currency;
6. To coinage, weights, and measures: to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures;
7. To commerce: to the Committee on Commerce, [but they shall report the bill known as the river and harbor bill, for reference to the Committee on Appropriations.]

Mr. REAGAN. By instructions of the Committee on Commerce, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend clause 7 of Rule XI by striking out the words "but they shall report the bill known as the river and harbor bill for reference to the Committee on Appropriations," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and the Committee on Commerce shall have the same privilege in reporting bills making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors as is accorded to the Committee on Appropriations in reporting general appropriation bills."

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say just one word. What is proposed to be inserted there is the rule of the House now. We simply propose to put into these rules what was adopted by the action of the House on the 9th of April.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I offer as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend clause 7 by striking out all after the word "committee," in the last line, and inserting the words "of the whole House."

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I desire to say just one word in regard to the substitute I have offered. If it be adopted the Committee on Commerce will then have the preparation of the river and harbor bill, as has been the custom; and when reported it will go directly to the Committee of the Whole House for consideration instead of to the Committee on Appropriations. I wish to bear testimony for one to the fidelity with which that committee has discharged its duties; but I think that other committees of this House also have discharged their duties well and faithfully.

The question being taken on the substitute for the amendment, there were—ayes 30, noes 97.

So (further count not being called for) the substitute for the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. HOUSE. Let that amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BROWNE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. May there not be a division of the question so that it shall be taken first on the motion to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules of the House a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask that the vote be taken by tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 34 members voting therefor; more than one-fifth of a quorum.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 110, noes 40.

So Mr. REAGAN'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the following amendment:

Add at the end of the amendment just adopted the following:
But the river and harbor bill shall never be passed by suspension of the rules.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to me I will now move that the committee rise.

Mr. KENNA. Let us vote first on the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. Let it be again reported.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky

[Mr. BLACKBURN] proposes to move that the committee do now rise. If so I withdraw the amendment, as it appears not to be acceptable.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. As it is evident there are many amendments to be offered to this rule, and as the House is to meet again at half past seven, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Rules, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] asks leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Joseph A. Briggs, there being no adverse report thereon. The request is referred to the Committee on War Claims.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FISHER for two days, and to Mr. BINGHAM for two days.

RECESS.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move that the House take a recess until 7.30 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled and was called to order at ten minutss before eight o'clock.

RECEPTION OF HON. CHARLES STEWART PARNELL.

The SPEAKER. The session of this evening is in consequence of a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives, which the Chair will now cause to be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In response to the invitation just presented and accepted, requesting the House to agree to take part in the ceremonies to be observed in the reception of Mr. Charles Stewart Parnell, a representative of the Irish people, for the delivery of an address on Irish affairs, and because of the great interest which the people of the United States take in the condition of Ireland, with which this country is so closely allied by many historic and kindred ties: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Hall of this House be granted for the above purposes on the 2d day of February next, and that the House meet on that day and time to take part in said ceremonies.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the terms of the resolution which has been read, I have now the honor and the pleasure to introduce to you Charles Stewart Parnell, of Ireland, who comes among us to speak of the distresses of his country.

Mr. Parnell was received with long-continued applause. He said:

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I have to thank you for the distinguished honor that you have conferred upon me in permitting me to address this august assembly upon the state of the affairs of my unhappy country.

Until I landed in America nothing was known of the imminence or threatened extent of the famine which has now assumed such horrible proportions as to attract the attention and compassion of all civilized nations. To every thinking man it must be a matter of perplexity how such a famine could burst upon a people without giving any warning of its approach. But in fact this catastrophe was clearly foreseen and predicted six months ago in Ireland, and government was repeatedly warned to make timely preparations to deal with it. But the British government not only refused to do anything, but with extraordinary perversity persisted in denying that there was any danger of famine. And now that thousands are starving the singular spectacle is presented of a government which refuses to come to the aid of its own subjects sanctioning appeals to the charity of America or any other nation which may be ready to feed them.

The present famine, as all other famines in Ireland, has been the direct result of the system of land tenure which is maintained there. And while we have been compelled by the frightful condition of our people to appear before the American people in the guise of beggars, and to use every exertion to collect money to save life, I feel it to be equally my duty to point out to you the cause which keeps Ireland in a condition of chronic poverty and brings on from time to time such horrible famines as that which is at present raging there. When the task is thrown upon America of feeding a people who have been driven into starvation by ruinous and unjust laws, surely you acquire a right to express your opinion very freely on the character of those laws and on the policy of maintaining them. And I have every confidence that the public sentiment of America will be a great assistance to our people in their present effort to obtain a just and suitable settlement of the Irish land question.

Since I have been in this country I have seen so many tokens of the good wishes of the American people toward Ireland that I feel entirely at a loss to express my sense of all the enormous advantage and service which is being daily done in this way to our cause. We do not seek to embroil your Government with the government of England; but we claim that the public opinion and sentiment of a free country like America is entitled to find expression wherever it is seen that the laws of freedom are not observed.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the most pressing question in Ireland at the present moment is the tenure of land. That question is a very old one; it dates from the first settlement of Ireland from England. The struggle between those who own the land on the one side and those who till it on the other has been a constant one. But up to the present moment scarcely any ray of light has ever been let in upon the hard fate of the tillers of the soil in that country. But many of us who are now observing the course of events believe that the time is fast approaching when the artificial and cruel system of land tenure prevailing in Ireland is bound to fall and be replaced by a more natural and a more just one.

I could quote many authorities to show you what this system is. The feudal tenure has been tried in many countries, and it has been found wanting everywhere. But in no country has it wrought so much destruction and proved so pernicious as in Ireland. As the result of that feudal tenure we have constant and chronic poverty; we have our people discontented and hopeless. Even in the best of years theirs is one of continual misery. And when, as on the present occasion, the crops fail and a bad year comes around, we see terrific famines sweeping across the face of our land, claiming their victims in hundreds of thousands, driving multitudes into a forced and pauperized immigration, and leaving a settled gloom and terror behind as the inheritance, for years, of the survivors.

Mr. Froude, the distinguished English historian, who cannot be accused of being a prejudiced witness in our favor, gives his testimony with regard to this land system in the following words:

But of all the feudal gifts which we bestowed upon our unhappy possession was the English system of owning lands. Land, properly speaking, cannot be owned by any man. It belongs to all the human race. Laws have to be made to secure the profits of their industry to those who cultivate it. But the private property of this or that person which he is entitled to deal with as he pleases land never ought to be and never strictly is. In Ireland, as in all primitive civilizations, the soil was divided amongst the tribes. Each tribe collectively owned its own district. Under the feudal system the proprietor was the crown as representing the nation; while the subordinate tenures were held with duties attached to them, and were liable on non-fulfillment to forfeiture.

Now, I look upon this testimony of Mr. Froude's as a most important and valuable one coming as it does from an English source, and a source which cannot be called prejudiced in favor of Ireland. As Mr. Froude says, property has its duties under the feudal system of tenure as well as its rights. But in Ireland those enjoying the monopoly of the land have only considered that they had rights, and have always been forgetful of their duties; so that bad as the feudal tenure must be it has there been worked in a way to intensify its evils tenfold. I find that a little further on Mr. Froude again writes to the following effect:

And if we had been more faithful in our stewardship, Ireland would have been as wealthy and prosperous as the sister island, and not at the mercy of a potato-blight. We did what we could; we subscribed money; we laid a poor-law on the land. But it was to no purpose. The emigrants went away with rage in their hearts, and a longing hope of revenge hereafter with America's help.

[Cheers and applause.]

But I could multiply testimony from distinguished sources, and of well-known men, to the same effect. I shall content myself with quoting from one more source, Professor Blackie, the professor of Greek in Edinburgh University, who in the Cotemporary Review for this month writes as follows:

Among the many acts of baseness branding the English character in their blundering pretense of governing Ireland, not the least was the practice of confiscating the land, which, by brehon law, belonged to the people, and giving it not to honest resident cultivators, (which might have been a politic sort of theft,) but to cliques of greedy and grasping oligarchs, who did nothing for the country which they had appropriated but suck its blood in the name of rent, and squander its resources under the name of pleasure, and fashion, and courtliness in London.

Now, we have been told by the landlord party as their defense of this system that the true cause of Irish poverty and discontent is the crowded state of that country, and the only remedy emigration; and I admit to the fullest extent that there are portions of Ireland which are too crowded. The barren hills of the west of Ireland, whither the people were driven from the fertile lands after the famine, are too crowded; but the fertile portions of Ireland maintain scarcely any population at all, and remain as vast hunting-grounds for the pleasure of the landlord class.

Before, then, we talk of emigration as the cure for all the ills of Ireland, I should like to see a more natural distribution of the soil of that country. I should like to see the rich plains of Meath, Kildare, Limerick, and Tipperary, instead of being the desert wastes that they are to-day, supporting the teeming and prosperous population that they are so capable of maintaining. At the present moment you may drive for ten or twenty miles through those great rich counties without meeting a human being or seeing a single house. And it is a remarkable testimony to the horrible way in which the land system has been administered in Ireland that the fertility of the country has proved the destruction of the population, instead of being their support. Only on the poor lands have our people been allowed to settle, and there they are crowded in numbers far too great for the soil to support. Let the next emigration be from the West to the East, instead of from the East to the West—from the hills of Connemara back to the fertile lands of Meath. When the resources of my country have been fully taken advantage of and developed, when the agricultural prosperity of Ireland has been secured, then if we have any surplus population we shall cheerfully give it to this great country. Then our emigrants will go willingly and as free men—not shoveled out by a forced emigration, a disgrace to the Government whence they come and to humanity in general. [Applause.] Then our emigrants would come to you as come the Germans, with money in their pockets, and education to enable them to obtain a good start in this great and free country, with sufficient means to enable them to push out to your western lands, instead of remaining about the eastern cities, doomed to hard manual labor, and many of them falling a prey to the worst evils of modern city civilization.

I have noticed within the last few days a very remarkable refutation to this argument of overcrowding, in one of the newspapers of this country—the Nation—a journal, I believe, distinguished in the walks of literature, and whose opinion is entitled to very great weight and consideration. The Nation says:

> That the best remedy for Irish poverty is to be found in the multiplication of peasant properties and not by emigration, as many suppose, there is little question. Emigration is good for those who emigrate; but it leaves gaps in the home population which are soon filled by a fresh poverty-stricken mass. A writer in the London Times, giving an account of the island of Guernsey, shows that it supports in marvelous comfort a population of thirty thousand by the cultivation of ten thousand acres, while Ireland has a cultivable area of 15,500,000 acres, and would, if as densely peopled as Guernsey, support a population of forty-five million instead of five million.
> [Applause.]
> The climate of Guernsey, too, is as moist as that of Ireland, and the island is hardly any nearer the great markets. But nearly every man in it owns his farm, and the law facilitates his getting a farm in fee on easy terms.

Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, the remedy that we propose for the state of affairs in Ireland is an alteration of the land tenure prevailing there. We propose to imitate the example of Prussia and other continental countries, where the feudal tenure has been tried, found wanting, and abandoned; and we desire to give an opportunity to every occupying tenant-farmer in Ireland to become the owner of his own farm. [Applause.]

This may, perhaps, seem at first sight a startling proposition; and I shall be told about the "rights of property" and "vested interests" and "individual ownership." But we have the high authority of Mr. Froude, the English historian, whom I have just quoted, to the effect that—

> Land, properly speaking, cannot be owned by any man. It belongs to all the human race. Laws have to be made to secure the profits of their industry to those who cultivate it; but the private property of this or that person which he is entitled to deal with as he pleases, land never ought to be and never strictly is.

And we say if it can be proved, as it has been abundantly proved, that terrible sufferings, constant poverty, are inflicted on the millions of the population of Ireland, we may then reasonably require from the legislature that, paying due regard to vested interests and giving them fair compensation, the system of ownership of the soil by the few in Ireland should be terminated and replaced by one giving that ownership to the many.

As I have pointed out, we have historical precedents for such a course. The King of Prussia in 1811, seeing the evils of the feudal tenure, by a royal edict transferred all the land of his country from the landlords to the tenants. He compensated the landlords by giving them government bonds bearing 4 per cent. interest; and he ordained that the tenants should repay to the state the principal and interest of these bonds by annual installments of 5 per cent., extending over forty-one years, and that then all payments should cease. The preamble to this edict is so very remarkable that I venture to trespass on your time for a few moments by reading it:

> We, Frederick William, by the grace of God King of Prussia, having convinced ourselves both by personal experience in our own domains and by that of many lords of manors of the great advantages which have accrued both to the lord and to the peasant by the transformation of peasant-holdings into property and the commutation of the rents on the basis of a fair indemnity, and having consulted in regard to this weighty matter experienced farmers, ordain and decree as follows:
> That all tenants of hereditary holdings, whatever the size of the holding, shall by the present edict become the proprietors of their holdings, after paying to the landlord the indemnity fixed by this edict.

But we have also precedents for the course we propose afforded by the legislation of Great Britain. The Parliament of England has already, under the Bright clauses of the land act, expressed its approval of the principle that a class of tenant or peasant owners should be created in Ireland. That act permitted the state to advance to tenants desirous of purchasing their holdings two-thirds of the purchase money, to be repaid by installments of 5 per cent., extending over thirty-five years. Those clauses, for a variety of reasons which I dare not trespass on your time long enough to explain, have remained a dead letter. But I see that Mr. John Bright, the eminent reformer, one of the originators of the movement for the repeal of the corn laws, and a fellow-laborer with Cobden in that movement, now comes forward and proposes to amend those clauses very considerably so as to make them more workable. By a cable dispatch from London I find that, speaking at Birmingham the other day, Mr. Bright proposed—

> To appoint a government commission to go to Dublin with power to sell farms of landlords to tenants willing to buy, and to advance three-fourths of the purchase-money, principal and interest to be repaid in thirty-five years. Such a measure, Bright believed, would meet the desire of the Irish people. The commission should assist the tenant to purchase whenever the landlord was willing to sell. He recommended compulsory sale only where the land is owned by London companies, as is the case with large tracts near Londonderry. He expressed the conviction that, if his plan was ever adopted, self-interest or public opinion would soon compel individual landlords to sell to the tenants.

Now, this proposal is undoubtedly a very great reform and an immense advance upon the present state of affairs. While we could not accept it as a final settlement of the land question, yet we should gladly welcome it as an advance in our direction; and we are willing to give it a fair trial. The radical difference between our proposition and that of Mr. Bright is that we think the state should adopt the principle of compulsory expropriation of land, whereas Mr. Bright thinks it may be left to self-interest and the force of public opinion to compel the landlords to sell. For that is the word which he uses, "compel."

While I concur with Mr. Bright in thinking that, in all probability, if his proposals were adopted the present land agitation in Ireland, if maintained at its present vigor, would compel the landlords to sell to tenants at fair prices, yet I ask the House of Representatives of America what would they think of a statesman who, while acknowledging the justness of a principle, as Mr. Bright acknowledges the justness of our principle that the tenants of Ireland ought to own the lands, shrinks at the same time from asking the legislature of his country to sanction that principle and leaves to an agitation such as is now going on in Ireland the duty of enforcing that which the Parliament of Great Britain should enforce. [Loud applause.] I think you will concur with me that this attempt on the part of the British Parliament to transfer its obligations and duties to the helpless, starving peasantry of Connemara is neither a dignified nor a worthy one, and that the sooner our Parliament comes to recognize its duties in this respect the better it will be for all parties and the government of Great Britain.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I have to apologize for having trespassed on your attention at such great length, and to give you my renewed and heartiest thanks for the very great attention and kindness with which you have listened to my feeble and imperfect utterances. I regret that this great cause has not been pleaded by an able man, but at least the cause is good, and, although put before you imperfectly, it is so strong and so just that it cannot fail in obtaining recognition at your hands and from the people of this country. It will be a proud boast for America if, after having obtained, secured, and ratified her own freedom by sacrifices unexampled in the history of any nation, she were now, by the force of her public opinion alone, by the respect with which all countries look upon any sentiment prevailing here, if she were now to obtain for Ireland, without the shedding of one drop of blood, without drawing the sword, without one threatening message, the solution of this great question. For my part, I, as one who boasts of American blood, [loud and long-continued applause,] feel proud of the importance which has been universally attached on all sides to American opinion with regard to this matter, and I am happy in seeing and believing that the time is very near at hand when you will be able to say you have in the way I have mentioned, and in no other way, been a most important factor in bringing about a settlement of the Irish land question. [Applause.] And then, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, these Irish famines now so periodical, which compel us to appear as beggars and mendicants before the world, a humiliating position for any man but a still more humiliating position for a proud nation like ours—then, Mr. Speaker, these Irish famines will have ceased when their cause has been removed. We shall no longer be compelled to tax your magnificent generosity, and we shall be able to promise you that with your help this shall be the last Irish famine. [Great applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the ceremonies for which this meeting was called having closed, I now move the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at eight o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 3, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DISTRICT SINKING FUND.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of the Treasurer of the United States on the operations of the sinking fund pertaining to the District of Columbia; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COMPLETION OF DOUBLE-TURRETED MONITORS.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask leave to present a petition of the Harlan and Hollingsworth Company, of Wilmington, Delaware, praying that an appropriation may be made to finish the double-turreted monitor Amphitrite, now on the stocks in their yard. As the petition is short I ask that it be read, and I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a statement respecting it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be reported.

The petition was read, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives:

Your petitioners beg leave to state that they have in their ship-yard, in a partly finished condition, the hull of the double-turreted monitor Amphitrite, the work upon it having been suspended by an order from the honorable Secretary of the Navy, dated March 16, 1877, awaiting additional appropriations.

In consequence of this suspension, your petitioners have suffered serious inconvenience and loss by being deprived of one of their most valuable building slips, and as a consequence they have lost many contracts that they might otherwise have taken.

Your petitioners therefore entreat most earnestly that the necessary appropriations may be made to enable the honorable Secretary of the Navy to have the vessel completed, and thus relieve us from our embarrassment, as well as stop the constantly accruing expenses against the Government.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

THE HARLAN AND HOLLINGSWORTH COMPANY,
J. T. GAUSE, Vice-President.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, in view of the practical importance of the Government taking some action in respect to finishing this vessel, I ask leave to draw the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom this petition will be sent, to a statement of the facts.

This vessel is one of four. In 1875 her construction was commenced under a contract for a certain step in her construction. The step was taken according to the contract and paid for. In 1876 other steps were taken. In 1877, on the 3rd of March, a contract was made by the Navy Department to finish these vessels, but that contract was arrested in the course of a few weeks thereafter by an order of the present Secretary of the Navy, and it has never been renewed. As a consequence, this vessel, of which I speak from my own knowledge, from personal inspection, has lain in a partially finished condition, occupying a very valuable and important position in the ship-yard of the builders, incomplete and useless for any purpose. No money has been appropriated to finish it. I believe the same state of facts exists in regard to the other three. The consequence is there is loss to the Government, there is loss and inconvenience to the builder, and there is a growing claim against the Government for the damage to the contractors in keeping this vessel in the position she now is. If the vessel is not to be finished, it were better she should be sold as old iron. If she is to be finished, the sooner it is done the better.

On this subject a letter has been written by the Secretary of the Navy to the Committee on Naval Affairs of the other House, which I shall not detain the Senate by reading at length, but will merely say that it sets forth that the completion of these four double-turreted ships with modern improvements, fitting them to take their place in warfare usefully according to the scale of modern improvements, will amount to about $3,000,000.

I say nothing of the condition of our Navy. I do not know that I have the information that justifies me to speak of it; but certain it is that vessels of this class are considered by those having charge of the Navy of the country as essentially necessary for completion for harbor defense, and for perhaps more than harbor defense; for while they cannot be termed, and never will be probably sea-going vessels, to be used as cruisers, they will be capable of being moved from port to port in order to defend such points as may be vulnerable and need defense.

Last summer I interested myself when in England in looking in a cursory way at the condition of their iron-clads. I visited several of them in the docks at Chatham, and when I viewed the strength, the power, the invulnerability of those ships capable of going to sea, I must say that my apprehensions grew to be of a very painful nature. I did not see anything, nor do I now know anything, unless it be the system of defense by torpedoes, that could prevent one of many ships to-day in the British naval service from steaming into any port upon the coasts of the United States and there laying waste any city lying upon our seaboard.

As to the question of expense, here are four vessels which are to be finished, with the approbation of naval constructors, under the Navy Department, as of a grade fitted to place them in the full scale and abreast of others in modern improvement for defensive purposes. The cost of those four is $3,000,000. The cost of one ship in England, which I went over last autumn, was $3,600,000. I have here, in a slip from a late newspaper, a description of four armored ships built for the Italian government, any one of which would be impenetrable to the attack of any vessel or vessels of the United States Navy to-day. The cost of these vessels in Italy is here stated, and that of any one of the four greatly exceeds the combined cost of the four vessels proposed by the estimate of the Secretary of the Navy.

Therefore, it seems to me that this condition of affairs ought to last no longer, but that the recommendations of the Navy Department for the completion of these ships should be fulfilled, and that the money necessary to make them available for harbor defense should be promptly supplied from the Treasury; or, should it be discovered, against the opinion of the Navy Department, that these vessels are not of a grade or of a character to warrant that disposition, then let the other measure be taken of disposing of their hulls as they lie; let them be sold for old iron, or what not, and the Government be saved from the expense, which it must finally respond to, of paying for the loss and damage to those who have fairly and honorably undertaken to complete their contract with the Government, but have been arrested and prevented from their completion. To stand as they are now is worse than useless; and if their completion is to be decreed, it cannot be too promptly or it cannot be too liberally complied with.

With these remarks I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present the petition of William B. Hayford, one of the trustees of the European and North American Railway Company, in Maine, reciting certain matters in relation to the manufacture of steel rails, and concluding with the prayer that the Congress of the United States enact a law that the duty hereafter imposed upon imported steel rails shall be specific, at a rate not exceeding $10 per ton. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of James S. Walker and others, soldiers of the late war, praying for the enactment of a law for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Robert Lawrence and others, citizens of Illinois, praying for the passage of a law granting a pension to George Wiley, late private Company G, Eleventh Indiana Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAILEY presented the petition of A. Thomas Carr and others, citizens of South Carolina, praying for the passage of the bill (S. No. 865) to provide for the investment of certain unclaimed pay and bounty moneys now in the Treasury of the United States, and to facilitate and encourage the education of the colored race in the several States and Territories, and that the University of Wilberforce be included therein; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BUTLER presented additional papers in the case of Phœbe Meech, widow of Horace I. Meech, deceased, late of Company I, First Regiment New York Volunteers in the war with Mexico, praying for a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the petition of C. J. Ives, general superintendent of the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern Railway, in Iowa, praying for the enactment of a law reducing the duty on steel rails to $10 per ton; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLUMB presented the memorial of Martin Roy and others, citizens of Kansas and soldiers in the late war, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GROOME presented the petition of Lieutenant-Commanders James H. Sands and Charles D. Bigsbee, of the United States Navy, praying for the enactment of a law adopting the report of the board of admirals acting under the provisions of the act approved February 5, 1879, for the relief of B. B. Taylor and others; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PADDOCK presented the petition of Jacob Steinmetz and 52 others, citizens of Sutton County, Nebraska, and soldiers of the late war, praying for the passage of a bill for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 965) for the relief of D. T. Kirby, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 592) for the relief of Redmond Tully, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Flora A. Darling, praying the passage of a law referring her claim for bonds and money alleged to have been taken from her on a flag-of-truce boat during the late war, to the Secretary of War, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 175) for the relief of Major P. P. G. Hall, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3968) for the relief of certain actual settlers on the Kansas trust and diminished-reserve lands, in the State of Kansas, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 952) for the relief of James Burke, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 290) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue wall-tents to the superintendent of the Virginia Military Institute, to report it adversely. I will state in connection with this report, as the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] who introduced the bill, is not present, that I wrote to the Adjutant-General and he in reply called my attention to the report of the Quartermaster-General, stating that the tents could not be furnished without detriment to the public service, and that an appropriation would have to be made to comply with the provisions of the bill. For that reason the committee report the bill adversely, and I move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 287) for the relief of the heirs of Charles B. Smith, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Seth Driggs, praying that the award against him, rendered by the mixed commission formed by the United States and New Granada, be set aside and declared void, and the case reopened for a new hearing, reported adversely thereon, and the committee were discharged from further consideration of the petition.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1153) to restore to the public domain a part of the military reservation known as the Fort Ripley reservation, in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) authorizing the remission or refunding of duty on a stained-glass window, from Munich, Germany, for All Saint's church, in Saint Michael's parish, in Talbot County, Maryland, reported it without amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1056) donating six condemned iron cannon to John D. Musser Post, No. 66, Grand Army of the Republic, of Muncy, Pennsylvania, to build a fence around the soldiers' monument in the Muncy cemetery, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 83) granting condemned cannon to the Morton Monumental Association, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3562) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2902) to place William Gaines, late ordnance-sergeant, United States Army, on the retired list, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 3) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell or lease to the Port Huron and Northwestern Railway Company a portion of the Fort Gratiot military reserve, and to authorize the city of Port Huron to grant to said railway company the right of way through Pine Grove Park, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 757) for the relief of Gallus Kerchner, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes, commonly known as the Warner bill, to report it adversely. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BECK. I rise only to say that the report of the Finance Committee on what is known as the Warner bill is not the unanimous report of the committee, and that the minority hope to be heard when the bill is reached on the Calendar.

REMOVAL OF DESERTION CHARGES.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 876) for the relief of Edward Corselius and seven other persons, late members of the First Michigan Cavalry Veteran Volunteers, have had the same under consideration and directed me to report it adversely, and recommend that it be indefinitely postponed. This bill is one to remove from the military record of these persons the charge of desertion; that is, to correct their record and allow them back pay and bounty. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the conclusion at which the committee has arrived. The report says:

> In view of the very large number of cases where the charges of desertion exist on the record, and the numerous cases coming before Congress for special legislation, your committee deem it proper to express their conviction that special legislation is neither proper nor wise, and that, as a general rule, the War Department now has ample power to do equal and exact justice to every such applicant for relief, and that no special legislation will be recommended except in special and exceptional cases where soldiers, by reason of sickness or wounds, have been absent from their commands, and by reason of such absence have been reported as deserters.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if he understands that it is the opinion of the War Department that that Department has ample power to do justice in such cases?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is the opinion of the War Department, they state in their report, which is appended here—a very elaborate report in which the number of desertions from the Army and the number of applications made to the Department for the removal of the charges of desertion are all stated in full—that they have full authority now under the rules and regulations and existing laws to do equal and exact justice to every applicant for relief.

I will state further that the disabilities attending the charge of desertion are not so onerous as is generally supposed. The Pension Bureau pays very little attention to the charge of desertion. Soldiers dishonorably discharged are pensioned just the same as those honorably discharged, the only difference being the date of the pension. I know this will be news to the Senate, but I have the official report of the Commissioner of Pensions stating the fact, and I state nothing in which I am not backed by the official report. Desertion does not deprive soldiers of back pay necessarily, but it does deprive them of bounty. A very large number of deserters have been relieved of their forfeiture of citizenship, so that the disabilities are very small.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If in order, I should like to say a single word. The Senator from Missouri seems to consider that the worst consequence of the record showing that a soldier was a deserter is the loss of back pay and bounty. That is not so considered, I know, by some soldiers in the State from which I come. They consider the disgrace attaching to such a record as a more serious matter than the loss of both back pay and bounty. I happen to have the means of knowing that some volunteer soldiers from that State have such records under circumstances which, in my judgment, entitle them to have the disgrace removed, and yet they are not within the rule that the War Department holds itself bound to administer in removing the charge of desertion of its own motion. There is a bill accompanying the report, I understand.

Mr. COCKRELL. A special bill for the relief of certain persons.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. So that the matter will go upon the Calendar?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If desired.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to look into this matter a little.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

PRINTING OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the Committee on Finance be authorized to have printed the proceedings of the interviews held by them with the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to funding the national debt and other subjects.

The order was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1198) to pay Samuel I. Gustin for supplies furnished to the Army of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent, without previous notice, to introduce a bill, which I have been requested to introduce by Governor Lowe, an honorable practicing attorney of this city, for the benefit of some of my own constituents. I know nothing of the merits of the case.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1199) to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SLATER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1200) for the relief of B. Jennings; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1201) granting a pension to Henry Williams; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1202) for the relief of Hiram S. Town; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1203) for the relief of Margaret B. Franks, sole heir at law of Thomas L. Franks, of Green Bay, Wisconsin, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the accompanying petitions and papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1204) granting a pension to Michael M. Field; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. ROLLINS. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, directed to inform the Senate what, if any, action has been taken by them, under the act of Congress of June 10, 1879, authorizing an advance of the sum of $25,000 to improve the water supply on Capitol Hill; whether any money has been expended for that purpose, and, if so, how the same was expended; what new connections, if any, were made with the water-mains; on what streets; the amount so expended; from what fund the same was taken, and with what result.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to make an objection, but I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire whether it is customary for the Senate to call upon the commissioners of the District to communicate with the Senate? It may be permissible under some statute, which the Senator is more likely to know than I, but I venture to call his attention to the fact that unless there is such a statute it would be rather an unusual thing for the Senate to address the commissioners of the District, and require them to address the Senate in return.

Mr. ROLLINS. The commissioners of the District of Columbia have in various instances been called upon to communicate information to the Senate. It was done during the last session of Congress repeatedly. They make an annual report to Congress also.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator says it is the custom of the Senate, I make no objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire, who is a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia. I ask the Senator if he knows whether the sum of $25,000 to which the resolution refers has been drawn from the Treasury or not?

Mr. ROLLINS. I think it has not been drawn from the Treasury. The resolution was agreed to.

LINE OF NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate the general lines of location of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and what changes, if any, have been made by said company in their general line of location and approved by the Department since their organization to the present date, giving the average distances respectively between such several lines of location and the extent and general character of such changes; also a statement of the lands withdrawn from settlement in favor of said company under the several locations made, and to what extent such several changes of location have affected the rights of settlers.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie upon the table:

Resolved, That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day after —— the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, and continue such consideration until half past one o'clock, and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let the proposed order be printed so that we may know exactly what it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be printed.

RETIREMENT OF NON-COMMISSIONED ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. MAXEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of such legislation as said committee may deem proper, authorizing worthy and meritorious non-commissioned officers of the United States Army, who have faithfully and honorably served therein continuously a period of thirty years or upward, to be placed on the retired list with such pay and allowances as may be just, and to report by bill or otherwise.

DISTRICT HEALTH ORDINANCES.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 189) legalizing the health ordinances and regulations for the District of Columbia, which I had the honor to report yesterday from the Committee on the District of Columbia and which I gave notice I should call up to-day.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the substitute reported by the committee be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment, and was interrupted by

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have been approached by a great many gentlemen of this city in regard to this measure, and they ask for more time to consider it. I ask that the joint resolution go over until to-morrow, so that these parties may have time to examine it further.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the Secretary finish the reading of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will finish the reading of the substitute of the committee, and the Chair will then recognize the Senator from Virginia.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I have an amendment to offer to the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. If I am in order a moment, before the joint resolution is passed over, or before we take action, I should like to make an inquiry. What is the need of legalizing these regulations of the board of health?

Mr. BUTLER. The court has decided that it is necessary that the ordinances passed by the board of health be legalized by Congress before the penalties can be enforced.

Mr. CONKLING. Have we ever legalized such regulations before?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. That was my impression. Therefore I venture to suggest that although the regulations are referred to in the joint resolution, before the Senate can act intelligently upon it, and the more so as some of them are referred to only by number, the regulations themselves ought to be printed separately and be before the Senate. I know, at least I infer, that by resorting to certain executive documents these ordinances could all be selected and grouped together; but if we are to legalize some and refuse to legalize others, not describing them by the subjects to which they relate but merely by their numbers, it becomes a process so difficult that few Senators are likely to undergo it in order to have an intelligent view of this subject. If we are for the first time by a law to legalize all the things said by this board which they have formulated as regulations, I think we ought to go rather sure-footed. Therefore, particularly if the joint resolution is to lie over, I suggest to the Senator having charge of it that it might be well in some form to bring before us, so that it will be easy of access, the body of the rules and regulations upon which this measure is to operate.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the Senator is mistaken in saying that the regulations are referred to only by their numbers.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me one moment, if the Clerk will read again the substitute proposed, the words will be heard, "except that sections 9," and so on, reciting a good many of them, are not legalized.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely. That refers to the sections of the ordinances themselves.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator to say that the ordinances or regulations proposed to be legalized were only referred to by their number.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I was unfortunate in expressing myself. I meant to say, and I do say, that touching some of these sections, they are by arbitrary numbers merely excepted from the operations of this proposed act.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely.

Mr. CONKLING. Therefore, the Senator will see that unless somebody may be industrious enough to go and look up all these sections, wherever they are to be found in any of our statutes, or in some executive document, it is a very blind mode of proceeding.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to have the amendment I offered to the amendment of the committee read before a final disposition is made of the joint resolution for to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 24 of the amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia, after the word "small-pox," it is proposed to add:

Eighth. Regulations to secure a full and correct record of vital statistics, including the registration of marriages, births, interments, disinterments, and removal of the dead in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I should be glad if the joint resolution were allowed to go over until to-morrow. It is a matter of great concern to the District. I ask that these amendments be printed, and that the joint resolution lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to that course being taken. My anxiety and the anxiety of the committee arises simply from the fact that it has been represented to us that it is very important to have this action taken promptly if we expect to have benefit from it in order to control the spread of the small-pox in the District. I have not the slightest objection to the joint resolution going over. If the proposition of the Senator from New York should be adopted, it would require that these various ordinances, rules, and regulations should all be printed. I have them here.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator let me look at them for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. While that is pending I ask to have an order for the withdrawal of papers entered.

[The order appears under its appropriate head.]

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand that the Senate has consented that the joint resolution should go over until to-morrow?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has heard no objection to the suggestion. He now awaits the wish of the Senate as to the printing of the regulations, as suggested by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from New York made that suggestion, and I have not the slightest objection to it, none in the world.

Mr. CONKLING. By way of illustration, as my eye happens to fall upon it, I read to the Senate one of the provisions which is to become an act of Congress under this proposed law:

That ailantus trees, the flowers of which produce offensive and noxious odors, in bloom in the cities of Washington or Georgetown, or the more densely populated suburbs of said cities, are hereby declared nuisances, injurious to health; and any person maintaining such nuisances, who shall fail, after due notice from this board, to abate the same, shall, upon conviction, be fined not less than five nor more than ten dollars for every such offense.

That would be a fine, I suppose, for every tree. If I were going to doubt the safety of such a measure as this, applied to this section, I should say that to commit to a board entirely the discretion to decide what is due notice, whether one hour or one day, and then proceed to impose a fine upon every owner of every tree who did not cut it down, because the tree had been declared a nuisance, would be rather heroic practice. If we were going to have an act of Congress on that subject, I should think we ought at least to fix some time within which the owner, resident or non-resident, might escape this penalty. I read it only to show that some of these provisions confer very large powers; and I think before by a law, with the exception of three of these sections, we make them a penal law they should be before the Senate as part of this proceeding; so that we can see whether there be something still more rigorous than this first section upon which my eye happens to fall.

Therefore, I move that there be printed, so that we may see them, the ordinances referred to, with the numbers affixed to them as far as they appear in the joint resolution, so that we may know which are excepted and which are embraced.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to that suggestion. The order will be entered.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of W. S. Grant be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers relating to the claim of William M. Pleas and F. S. Jones, now on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims, to accompany Senate bill No. 431.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3258) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior and Secretary of War to employ additional clerks for the balance of this fiscal year, to expedite the settlement of pension applications, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4213) to appropriate money for the continuance of improvement of certain navigable waters.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 582) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Columbus, Ohio, and transferring certain counties from the northern to the southern district in said State; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol, along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes.

N. BOYDEN.

Mr. GROOME. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 715.

The bill (S. No. 715) for the relief of N. Boyden was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $75, without interest, to the estate of N. Boyden, for rent of rooms in Salisbury, North Carolina, from January 1 to March 31, 1866, used for post headquarters, under contract with Boyden, at a monthly rental of $25.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to know what this bill is about.

Mr. RANSOM. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that if he will read the report he will see that it is a bill that ought to pass and about which there can be no difference of opinion.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Is there a written report?

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir, a unanimous report.

Mr. TELLER. The bill is all right. It is a case of contract.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa desire the reading of the report?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If there is a report I should like to have it read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GROOME on the 22d of January:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 715) for the relief of N. Boyden, have considered the same, and find the facts as stated in the report of the Senate Committee on Claims in the Forty-fifth Congress, being report No. 78. This committee concur in that report, and report back the bill referred to them (which is identical with the substitute mentioned in said report) with a recommendation that it pass. The report concurred in by this committee is as follows:

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, substituted the following report, to accompany bill S. No. 685:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 33) for the relief of R. W. Corbin and others, have duly considered the same, so far as the rights of Mr. Boyden are affected, and submit the following report:

Your committee referred the bill to the Secretary of the Treasury, with a letter asking for information and facts touching the claim, and received from the Acting Secretary the following answer:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 1, 1877.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th ultimo, inclosing a copy of a bill for the relief of N. Boyden, for rent of a house, and calling for such information as may be in possession of this Department touching the same.

"The Third Auditor of the Treasury states that the claim of N. Boyden in his office is for $75, being the amount of three vouchers issued to him by Lieutenant H. C. Long, of the One hundred and twenty-eighth Indiana Volunteers, for rent of one house, used as post headquarters from January 1 to March 31, 1866, at $25.

"The claim was disallowed, under the provisions of act of Congress of February 21, 1867, which prohibits payment of this class of cases.

"The bill is herewith returned, as requested.

"Very respectfully,

The above accounts were on the usual blanks known as Form No. 22, partly printed and partly written. The action of the Department upon said claim is shown by the following letter among said papers, to wit:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
"October 29, 1877.

"Respectfully returned to Hon. H. S. French, Assistant Secretary.

"The claim of N. Boyden in this office is for $75, being the amount of three vouchers issued to him by Lieutenant H. C. Long, of the One hundred and twenty-eighth Indiana Volunteers, for rent of one house used as post headquarters from January 1 to March 31, 1866, at $25. The claim was disallowed under the provisions of act of Congress of February 21, 1867, which prohibits payment of this class of claims. Papers in claim transmitted herewith.

"HORACE AUSTIN, Auditor."

The Quartermaster-General's Department refused to pay the claim for the same reason.

That the act of February 21, 1867, (vol. 14, U. S. Stat. at L., p. 397,) provides that the act of July 4, 1864, "shall not be construed to authorize the settlement of any claim for supplies or stores taken or furnished for the use of or used by the armies of the United States, nor for the occupation of or injury to real estate, nor for the consumption, appropriation, or destruction of or damage to personal property by the military authorities or troops of the United States, where such claim originated during the war for the suppression of the southern rebellion in a State or part of a State declared in insurrection by the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated July 1, 1862, or in a State which, by an ordinance of secession, attempted to withdraw from the United States Government."

On April 2, 1866, the President, by proclamation, declared that the insurrection in the States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Mississippi was at an end.

Under said act of February 21, 1867, the Departments have declined to pay any claims originating in the insurrectionary States from the beginning of the insurrection to the date of the President's proclamation declaring the insurrection at an end, whether such claims arose under contracts or otherwise. And thus all persons whose just claims are based upon an express contract between themselves and the proper officers of the Government, made within the limits of the insurrectionary States within the period above named, are forced to appeal to Congress for relief.

This claim arose out of a contract between the claimant and the proper quartermaster, was duly signed, certified, and reported by said quartermaster, and approved by his commanding officer, and the estate of the claimant is certainly entitled to the amount specified in the contract.

Your committee report a substitute for the bill, and recommend the passage of the substitute so reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know what the reason is that this claim does not fall into the class that should properly go before the southern claims commission, so called?

Mr. RANSOM. The gentlemen of the committee who reported the bill will allow me to suggest that it ought to be amended and that in place of "Nathaniel Boyden" it should be the "legal representatives of Nathaniel Boyden."

Mr. GROOME. That amendment should be in the title. The body of the bill is correct.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps I was not heard by the Senator from Maryland. I wish to inquire, as I was not able to hear the reading of the first part of the report, why it is that this claim does not fall within the provisions of the act of Congress referring what are called southern claims to a commission.

Mr. GROOME. I am not able to answer the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is my own fault that I did not hear the reading of the first part of the report; but it appears that this transaction arose in 1866. If that be so, then undoubtedly the reason is that the southern claims commission only has jurisdiction of claims that arose during the existence of hostilities, or something of that kind. If this falls within the jurisdiction of the southern claims commission, it ought to have gone there; but I assume from these dates that it does not. If it does not, I do not see on the report of the committee that there is any objection to the payment of this claim.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the estate of N. Boyden."

WYOMING, MONTANA AND PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to call up Senate bill No. 90, reported from the Committee on Railroads.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 90) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Cheyenne, Black Hills and Montana Railroad and Telegraph Company.

Mr. COCKRELL. When was that bill reported?

Mr. TELLER. Last week some time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not find it on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. It is on the Calendar, on the last page.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was reported on the 29th of January.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a printed report with the bill?

Mr. TELLER. There is no printed report. It simply gives these people the right of way to build a railroad through the public lands. That is all there is of it. It makes no donation except the ten acres for stations. That may be stricken out if anybody thinks it too much.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There are amendments to the bill reported by the Committee on Railroads, which will be read.

The first amendment was stated to be in section 1, line 3, after the word "the," to strike out "Cheyenne, Black Hills, and" and insert "Wyoming;" and in line 4, after the word "Montana," to insert "and Pacific;" so as to read:

That for the purpose of enabling the Wyoming, Montana and Pacific Railroad and Telegraph Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the Territory of Wyoming, to construct and build its line from Cheyenne, in Wyoming Territory, by way of Fort Laramie, Deadwood, and through the Territories of Wyoming, Dakota, and Montana, to a connection with the Northern Pacific Railroad, in the Territory of Montana, by the most advantageous and practicable line, to be selected by said company, the right of way through the public lands in the Territories of Wyoming, Dakota, and Montana is hereby granted to said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 4, after the word "exceed," to strike out "eight" and insert "twelve;" in the same line, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" in line 5, after the word "mile," to insert "for narrow-gauge roads, and $2,500 per mile for standard-gauge roads;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That said company shall be authorized and empowered to mortgage in the usual manner its franchise, road-bed, and all property belonging to said company, to an amount not to exceed $12,500 per mile for narrow-gauge roads, and $2,500 per mile for standard-gauge roads, for the entire length of said road, upon such terms as may seem to them best, and upon said mortgage may issue mortgage bonds not to exceed the same amount per mile; but in no case shall the United States be liable in any way whatever for anything done by said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment is, at the end of the bill to add:

SEC. 6. Whenever any part of the present Territories of Wyoming, Montana, or Dakota, through which said road may run, shall be admitted into the Union as a State or States, so much of said railroad and its appurtenances and property as may be within any such State or States shall be subject to State taxation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment proposed by the committee by adding after the word "taxation," in line 6, the words "and subject in all respects to the sovereign legislative power of such State or States."

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to that amendment. The amendment proposed by the committee was the joint production of the Senator from Vermont and the late Senator from Michigan [Mr. Christiancy] on a bill for this same company that I believe passed the Senate a year ago. I suppose they had it then as they wanted it; but if not, I am quite willing they should now have it as they want it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to plead "not guilty," and put myself on the country, to having been any moving cause or part of the production of this amendment as it was reported by the committee, and I insist upon the proof.

The point of my amendment is that I wish to subject this corporation that now exists under a territorial charter to the complete and supreme jurisdiction of the State, with power in its Legislature to repeal the charter, or alter or amend it, when there comes to be a State, so that we shall not transmit and inject into some new State, that is created there, a charter like the old charter of the Manhattan Bank, I believe it is, in the State of New York, granted by the King of England, that is beyond all power of the State of New York to manage or control or repeal. I believe in making this motion, I shall have the sympathy, if not the vote of every Senator who hears me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the amendment to the amendment, nor to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to the amendment, except to one word of it. I wish the Senator would correct that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which is the "sovereign?"

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, I will take out the "sovereign." It sounds a little kingly.

Mr. CONKLING. It is a rule of rhetoric, I believe, that every word which does not add strength impairs it. I think that word does not add strength to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is so long since the war, that I thought "sovereign" would not squint too strongly of State rights, but I will take it out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out the second section of the bill, which I should like to have the Secretary read.

The Chief Clerk read section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That said company shall be authorized and empowered to mortgage in the usual manner its franchise, road-bed, and all property belonging to said company, to an amount not to exceed $12,500 per mile for narrow-gauge roads, and $2,500 per mile for standard-gauge roads, for the entire length of said road, upon such terms as may seem to them best, and upon said mortgage may issue mortgage bonds not to exceed the same amount per mile, but in no case shall the United States be liable in any way whatever for anything done by said company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the second section of the bill confers a power upon this corporation, that Congress did not charter, but that was chartered under the local law of home rule, as it might be called, of Wyoming Territory, to mortgage its franchises and all its property to a certain extent and for certain objects. My objection to that section is that the right to mortgage ought to be left to the power that created this company, and that if we grant the territorial Legislatures, as we have in this instance, the right to charter railway companies, we ought to leave it to them, as we have left it to them by our general laws, to decide for themselves according to the circumstances of the particular case whether a particular railroad company should be authorized to mortgage its property and franchises, or not, and that we ought not over the heads of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory, and in spite of their wishes whatever they may be—it may be in accordance with them or it may not; I do not put it upon that ground; I do not know—to declare that this company shall be authorized to make this mortgage. It may happen that under the territorial charter the territorial Legislature has decided that the company should not be authorized to make a mortgage at all, and that stock subscriptions should be received in order to build the road. If any such provision had existed or does exist, then it would be unjust in Congress after stockholders had paid in their money on the theory that they were to be the real and fundamental owners of the line, to say that the corporation might proceed to make a mortgage then, because the stockholder who had advanced his money would find that he was overridden, and in the end, as all such things usually happen, entirely frozen out by the paramount mortgage which was not authorized when he subscribed for his stock and paid his money.

I only state that as an illustration. It may not apply to this case at all; but I do say that it illustrates strongly the impropriety of our undertaking to say, (except in some extreme emergency that does not appear here,) that notwithstanding what the Legislature of the Territory may have done or may have declined to do, and without knowing anything about the particular circumstances of this particular case, this company may make this mortgage.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator from Vermont will permit me, if I understand his position, which I think is entirely correct, the effect of the second section would be to amend by act of Congress the charter of a territorial Legislature.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly; it comes to that.

Mr. TELLER. The trouble with the Senator from Vermont is that he has not examined the whole bill. This bill relates to a company which has acquired a charter under the laws of the Territory of Wyoming. Under that charter this company has the unquestioned right to build the railroad and to mortgage it in the Territory of Wyoming; but when they come to the Montana line they have not any such right, and, as was stated here last year on the floor of the Senate, unless the Montana laws have been since changed, there is no way for this company to acquire the right to build this road through Montana. They have failed to provide, what Wyoming has, a general law under which corporations may be incorporated. If they have provided it since that time, it necessitates a new corporation in Montana separate from that in Wyoming, and also a separate corporation in Dakota.

This is a long line that is practically useless until it reaches Dakota. The road built through Wyoming alone would not justify any outlay of money. The purpose is to build into the upper mining regions of Dakota, and for that reason they want the power to make it practically one corporation. We have an undoubted right here to grant a charter in the Territory of Wyoming, in the Territory of Dakota, and in the Territory of Montana, and there is no infringement upon the right of the people of Wyoming or any other section of the Territories when we do it. This company has been organized for the purpose of building this road. As yet it has not put any money in it. If this section is stricken out, I do not know how it will affect the people who propose to put in their money. I am informed by capitalists that if this permission is given to mortgage the road and build the road, making it practically one line from Cheyenne into the Deadwood country, they will build it.

As I have said, Montana, unless very recently, has no legislation of such a character as enables the railroad company to organize so that capitalists are willing to put money in the road; and as we here have an unquestioned right to create a corporation anywhere in the Territories without reference to the territorial laws, these capitalists come up and say, "If you will recognize the Wyoming charter and give us the right to mortgage our road in the other Territories in accordance with the provisions of this bill, we will build the road."

Mr. FARLEY. What portion of Montana would this route pass over?

Mr. TELLER. It would go through one edge of it, I understand.

Mr. FARLEY. In going from Cheyenne to Deadwood, would it be necessary to pass through Montana Territory at all?

Mr. TELLER. Not absolutely necessary, but the parties desire to have it so that they can pass through Montana. Perhaps it is not necessary absolutely, but I understand they propose under this charter to build in Montana.

Mr. ALLISON. They propose to build from Cheyenne to a connection with the Northern Pacific. They cannot make that connection without passing through Montana; but they do not pass through Montana in order to reach the Deadwood region.

Mr. TELLER. Not necessarily. They want to reach the upper mining regions, and when I speak of "the Deadwood country" I do not mean merely at Deadwood, for there is an area of mining country there that is bigger than all New England, and Deadwood is on one edge of it.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator who has charge of this bill whether there ought not to be a reservation of the general power to the States which may be formed out of these Territories over this railroad, when they come into the Union?

Mr. TELLER. That is already in.

Mr. HOAR. I do not find it in the bill before me.

Mr. TELLER. That is in one of the amendments proposed by the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator refer to section 6 printed in italics?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, sir; with the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and adopted.

Mr. HOAR. I have not seen the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado says that the necessity for this mortgage provision, while he acknowledges the general propriety of the principle I advance, is that this corporation of the Territory of Wyoming wishes to invade two other Territories, Dakota and Montana, and to build its road in those Territories, and without an act of Congress it cannot do it unless with the legislative assent of those two Territories that the Wyoming corporation proposes to go into.

Well, if there is anything at all in local Territorial government, they ought not to invade those Territories without the assent of their Legislatures. To be sure, we may grant them the right of way through the public land. That is one thing. But there is private property to be taken and condemned for public use and for public necessity; not to please capitalists, but to promote the public good, and who is to judge of the public good properly except the territorial Assemblies that have been elected by the people of these respective Territories, as to what these corporations may do. So the very fact that my honorable friend referred to as a reason for the necessity of this second section is to my mind a stronger reason for striking it out. The Territory of Montana ought to be left to judge for itself by the representatives of its people, into whose hands it will confide the right to take private property for public use, and to build a railroad in it, except as I say in some great and extreme public emergency as in the time of the war about the Pacific Railroad. That is another thing. But in the ordinary state of the case, as the thing is, for the profit of capital and for the convenience of miners, I repeat if there is anything at all in territorial self-government, as I think there is, it ought to be left to the Assemblies of the Territories of Montana and Dakota to declare whether they will allow this corporation to go into those Territories at all. Perhaps those two Territories may prefer to have a corporation of their own, just as a State might, and just as the coming-to-be States should have the right to do, and should have the unquestioned right to do when they come into that attitude.

So, Mr. President, I think it adds a reason for striking out this section. This company ought not to be allowed to take private property in these Territories, to mortgage its franchises and its property when it should have been taken there, except by the authority of the representatives of the people of those Territories who are in the long run to be chiefly affected by the operations of the company.

If the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, which is far north of the Deadwood region, thinks it necessary to have a railway to connect with the North Pacific, that territorial Legislature will in its own way, through its own agencies, provide for it; and if, as I said before, we are to confide to those people anything like self-government, do not let us in respect of these important matters of creating corporations, monopolies, the history of which I need not spend any time of the Senate to go into, and how they operate, leave it to the people of these Territories until some extreme emergency arises at any rate, to determine what ought to be done. I hope therefore the Senate will strike out this section.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, there is not anybody in Montana that will complain of any invasion of his rights by a railroad. If the Senator had lived in the West and as far from railroads as some of us have lived, he would not talk about an invasion by a railroad. If there is anything that these people will hail with delight, it is a railroad connecting them with their former homes. The people of Montana and Dakota where this road will strike, and Wyoming and the other regions beyond that, are anxious that this road should be built; and if the Senator desires to make a fight on this bill, he ought to put it on some other and better ground than that the people up there will be outraged by this invasion of a railroad.

Mr. President, of course they might get their Legislature together and they might enact a general law. They cannot enact a special law; they cannot give this company a charter; they cannot give this company any rights that they do not give every other company. They might enact a general law, and then you might go to work, and if you could find any way to consolidate together two or three corporations there, I do not know how you would go to work to do it except by act of Congress. Congress is supreme over the Territories, and has a right, if it is in the interest of the public, to create a corporation independent of anything the Territories may have done; and Congress has done it in every Territory in the Union, I think. They have certainly done it in these western Territories within the last few years. They did it in Colorado and in Wyoming and in Utah, and in Nevada when it was a Territory.

Now, Mr. President, I believe that the second section is necessary to the success of this enterprise; and if the friends of the bill, those who believe that the people out there ought to have a railroad in case somebody back in the East is willing to put in money to do what they have not the money to do, want them to have a railroad, they ought to vote for this second section, because I believe to strike out the section is practically to declare that the road shall not be built.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator what the second section means by authorizing the company to "mortgage in the usual manner."

Mr. TELLER. I suppose it means to execute a mortgage to secure bonds, to issue bonds, and then execute a mortgage to secure the bonds. That is the usual manner, I believe.

Mr. HOAR. But I understand that in a large proportion of the States of this country it is contrary to their settled legislative policy to permit any man to own a railroad, to allow a man living in New York, a man living in London, to acquire the absolute title, uncontrolled except by the general sovereign power—and how far that amendment of the Senator from Vermont may control it I do not know—by legislation; and it is usual, if not universal, to provide that railroads shall not be mortgaged or conveyed by the original corporation, except in a manner carefully regulated by legislation, and to provide that when a foreclosure takes place the persons holding the bonds or their trustees shall reorganize in a new corporation with all the obligations to make returns, all the obligations in regard to the management of the stock, all the obligations for the control and management of the railroad which rested upon the original corporation. That is either done by getting leave to make the mortgage at the time it is desired or by general law applicable to railroad mortgages.

Now, these railroads chartered for the young States and new Territories ought to be carefully controlled by legislative provision. The danger of their controlling legislation, their controlling politics, of corruption, of abuse, is very much greater when you have got one powerful railroad corporation extending five hundred miles through a new State than it is in a State like New York or Pennsylvania or Massachusetts. It seems to me that in making these new charters we ought to especially guard the railroad by the securities especially found necessary even in the older and more settled States. This railroad is to be the great corporation, the great power, the great controlling influence, if it goes through the length and breadth of Montana, in that State when it is admitted.

My suggestion is (not in a spirit of hostility, but of entire friendship to the Senator's desires, because I am sure he would not advocate a railroad bill which was not in the interest of the communities which he has so much knowledge of) whether there ought not to be either a distinct reservation, or, better, a provision that they shall apply to the Legislature of the State or Territory when they wish to mortgage their line, and that the details of the mortgage system shall be prescribed.

Mr. TELLER. I would say that I never saw a railroad charter containing the provisions suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. It is usually done by general legislation; and under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont and adopted by the Senate, the local authorities will have entire control over that matter, it seems to me. Therefore, it does not seem to me necessary to put in the bill such a provision as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests.

Mr. HOAR. I think the reservation to the sovereign power would not include power and control over this matter of mortgage. The mortgage will have been executed before the sovereign power of the State comes in at all.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the fear of the Senator from Massachusetts is that when this railroad is sold out under the mortgage, which may never be, then some man will buy it under the mortgage, and he will then own a railroad.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. You cannot regulate the contract then if that contract is now authorized. A mortgage is of course a right to acquire the property on certain terms and conditions by the mortgagee hereafter; and if the right to make a mortgage is given now without limit or control, that involves the right to acquire the property hereafter, and no constitutional power in this country can violate that contract.

Mr. TELLER. Congress has never yet adopted any provision of that kind and put it in a charter. They did not do it with the Union Pacific, the Kansas Pacific, the Denver Pacific, and the rest of the roads that they chartered and that have been built. Now, why they should seek to do it in regard to this road, which will be infinitely smaller than any I have mentioned except the Denver Pacific, less powerful, less profitable, is quite beyond my understanding. The bill is drawn in the usual way, and there is no opportunity for anybody to steal very much by building this railroad, and the men who build the road will have the worst of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, the second section seems to me an extraordinary provision for Congress to make. This corporation is chartered by the Territory of Wyoming, and we come in and by this section give them the broad privilege of mortgaging the road to a very large amount per mile, without in any way protecting the stockholders. It seems to me that it is entirely wrong that we should assume at all to give them a right to mortgage their road. Let the Legislature that chartered them do that. They get a charter and get some men to put in money, and then we authorize them to mortgage for a very large sum; or they get a charter and do not put in anything, and attempt to get authority from us to mortgage the road to the extent of $12,500 per mile for a narrow-gauge line. I am not a railroad man, but I think that is more than enough to build it.

Mr. PADDOCK. Not necessarily that amount; but that is the maximum.

Mr. KERNAN. We all know what that means when power is granted to borrow money on a road chartered by a State or Territory. I fear they will need it all. At any rate I do not think we ought so interfere about that matter; we should leave it to the authority granting the charter. The amount named is $12,500 a mile for a narrow-gauge road, and, as it reads, $2,500 per mile for a broad gauge. I suspect that is a mistake.

Mr. ALLISON. It should be $25,000.

Mr. KERNAN. It reads $2,500. What I wish to say is that we cannot wisely, it seems to me, attempt to exercise power and authority to allow a railroad company, incorporated by a territorial Legislature, whose charter I have not the means of seeing, to borrow money. The second section provides that we shall come in now and say that we authorize this company to borrow money on a mortgage not exceeding a pretty large amount per mile. I hope the section will be stricken out. I am willing to grant the right of way, but I cannot go further.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, I do not know what the relative cost of construction of narrow-gauge and broad-gauge roads is. I do know that this road is to be constructed through a very difficult country, a mountainous country, and I doubt if a narrow-gauge road could be constructed for less than $20,000 a mile. Every citizen in all that region of country, which has now no outlet, no facility whatever for getting its products to market, is in favor of this road. There is no other enterprise which has received so universally the approval of the cattle district and mining region west of the one hundredth meridian.

Mr. KERNAN. Assuming that to be so, why not let the Legislature of that people give the right to mortgage?

Mr. PADDOCK. Not only the Legislature of one people is interested, but this road is to run through three different Territories, and therefore it would not be possible unless there should be some action of this kind for loans to be negotiated which would enable the road to be constructed. The section might be improved, perhaps, but something of this kind is required to be done in order to induce capitalists to loan their money for the construction of the road. I have no personal interest in it myself. The line of the proposed road is far from my State, but I have a sympathy for the people of that section of country, who have no outlet whatever for their mining and other products, and am ready to aid in any way I can to secure them relief in this direction.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The idea suggested by the Senator from New York, that it would be improper for Congress to attempt to authorize a mortgage by a railroad corporation created by a Territory or State, presents to my mind the question whether there is any power in Congress to authorize the mortgage of a franchise granted by a territorial Legislature; whether Congress now can lay its hand on that franchise, which does not emanate from Congress, but from a territorial Legislature, and subject that franchise to a mortgage. I doubt whether Congress possesses such power. If Congress possess it, why may not every railroad created by any State charter, every railroad company chartered and created by any State Legislature, come to Congress and procure authority to grant away the very franchise which has been given by the State Legislature? I doubt whether there is such authority in Congress; but, if the authority exists, I concur with the view of the Senator from New York that the propriety of its exercise is not only doubtful, but entirely wrong. I, therefore, shall vote for striking out the second section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to strike out the second section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the sixth section:

Provided, That said railroad and telegraph company or the railroad which they are authorized to construct shall not become consolidated with or under the control and management of any other railroad company or corporation.

I offer this amendment because, as is well known to the Senate, the railroad corporations of this country are passing almost into a single hand, and it is a very grave question whether the true interests of this country are promoted by the consolidation of railroad companies under the management of the same person. All through the western country the railroads now are owned largely and controlled by the same class of men. They can fix the rates of transportation of merchandise and travelers according to their own pleasure, and prevent any competition by buying up and consolidating with other companies that attempt to construct competing railroad lines.

Now, while we are legislating on the subject granting the right of way to a company, I think it is very proper that we should guard the people of that country against the absorption of the company by other companies that now have the entire carrying trade of that region. I want to protect this company from being bought up and consolidated with existing corporations that are now controlling that entire country.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care very much about the amendment; I do not care whether it is passed or not; but I think it would be well for the Senator from Delaware to be consistent in his position. A moment ago he was afraid to lay his hand on the act of the territorial Legislature; then he regarded their act as exceedingly sacred; and now, without knowing whether they are opposed to or in favor of consolidating, whether the charter provides that they may consolidate or whether they shall not, he proposes to say by act of Congress that they shall not consolidate.

Mr. President, I believe that the bill without a provision for the mortgaging of the property is utterly worthless to any corporation, and I do not believe any set of men will put their money in and build the road. As the Senate now has stricken that out, and as it may have been stricken out because of the objections made by some of the Senators that may be cured, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Railroads.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I do not know without a moment's reflection whether I should express my judgment of this bill by voting for or against the motion to recommit. I agree entirely with the Senator from Colorado that, with the mortgaging section stricken out, the bill is virtually inoperative. I am inclined to think it ought to be. I see nothing in the bill which is not law already, except this provision, extraordinary as it seems to me, to confer on a territorial corporation the right to mortgage. Under the act of March 3, 1875, this corporation, unless I am mistaken, has everything which the Senator from Colorado has said it should have, save only this right to mortgage. My honorable friend agrees with me in that. I have had some difficulty to find an act of Congress, which is popularly known as "the defile act" among railway men, an act passed on the 3d of March, 1875, which act confers upon this corporation and upon every other corporation competent to receive such a grant a right of way like that described here over the public lands everywhere if its surveyed and located route goes there. Then it provides in its second section much more carefully as I think than this bill attempts to provide in section 3, that in narrow defiles, in gulches which are precipitous and furnishing a very narrow place to lay a track, all companies that choose to go there shall be allowed to go. Section 3 of this bill says that it shall not preclude the building of other roads; but the section now a law, which I have in my hand, provides not only that, not only for the preservation of wagon-roads as well as other conveniences, but it provides an equitable rule and adjustment upon which different roads shall occupy in common the cañons and defiles to which it applies. So that the statute of 1875 seems to me to cover everything aimed at in this bill except the section touching mortgages and their right, which the Senate has stricken out.

Now I should like to inquire of the Senator from Colorado, unless it is to confer upon this corporation the right to mortgage, what one thing there is which it lacks under the act of 1875? Can it not do exactly what is here proposed?

Mr. TELLER. I supposed myself, as I stated, that the main object of this bill was to enable this company to make itself practically a railroad corporation from Cheyenne through to the Pacific Ocean if it wanted to go there, or to the Northern Pacific road, or wherever it is going. As I said, section 2 is the main feature, I suppose, that capitalists want in the bill, and when it was stricken out, I repeated that I did not suppose anybody would build the road under the bill now.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator, cannot this corporation under the law as it exists go to the Pacific Ocean now if it can find any public land to go over?

Mr. TELLER. I have no doubt they can build through provided they can get a corporation organized in Montana and other places through which they pass; but the purpose, I suppose, was to give this a quasi-national character.

Mr. CONKLING. But this bill does not incorporate anybody.

Mr. TELLER. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Then upon the admission of the Senator from Colorado I think I am justified in this affirmation: first, this bill incorporates no one; second, it leaves the corporate powers of the body-corporate upon which it is to operate exactly what they are now except that it did undertake to confer power to mortgage, so that here comes a bill with long recitations and six sections which have no virtue and effect whatever except that one section which the Senate has stricken out. That is true, is it not?

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator makes a very broad statement when he says it has nothing. It may not have anything very valuable, and yet it gives to this company the right of way that it has under the general statute, and it gives it ten acres for depot grounds.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me read to my honorable friend section 1 of the act he denominates the general statute.

That the right of way through the public lands of the United States is hereby granted to any railroad company duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory, except the District of Columbia, or by the Congress of the United States, which shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation, and due proofs of its organization under the same, to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of the central line of said road.

Now I ask the Senator to observe:

Also the right to take, from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road, material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction of said railroad; also ground adjacent to such right of way for station, buildings, depots, machine-shops, side-tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, not to exceed in amount twenty acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each ten miles of its road.

There, then, is everything which this bill proposes to confer to which the Senator has yet called attention excepting always the section stricken out about mortgages. Now, Mr. President, I suggest that if it be the judgment of the Senate that Congress ought not to attempt to confer upon the creature of a territorial Legislature rights, not only beyond the purview of its charter, so confessed to be, but more particularly powers which may be in derogation of its charter and repugnant to the reservations of it, this bill ought not to be recommitted, for there is nothing else in it save that which stands here in this general statute. So, I suggest to the Senator from Colorado, without wishing to oppose any preference of his, that he had better take the judgment of the Senate upon the bill rather than to have it recommitted, unless he intends that it shall contain something beyond the one only substance upon which the Senate has voted.

Mr. TELLER. I have said two or three times that the only valuable section in my judgment was section 2. I did not introduce the bill. The men who declared that they wanted to build the road said they wanted the bill in that shape. I was anxious to see them build the road; and after making such amendments as the committee thought proper we reported the bill. Suppose it did confer the same rights that the general statute conferred before, was that an objection to the bill? It is hypercritical to come here and object to the bill on that ground; it does not amount to anything.

Is there any real objection to the bill? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said there was grave objection in the form of section 2. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] said there was a grave objection in the principle of section 2. Now, I say if it goes back to the committee, so far as the form is concerned—and it is impossible for me to say upon what the Senate voted, whether upon the form or upon the principle—we can report a bill the form of which will not be objectionable. I think it ought to go back.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator says it does no harm to repeat in the bill what the general statute provides. Possibly I might not deny that affirmation, although I think it would be very questionable work for the Senate to sit here and repeat in special charters what has been carefully said already in one general charter. But as the Senator was somewhat pronounced in inquiring whether there was any objection to what has been done here, with great frankness I answer him yes, there is very grave objection to the sort of repetition which we find in this bill. By accident or design I find here section 3, consisting of two lines and a half, in these words:

That the rights herein granted shall not preclude the construction of other roads through any cañon, defile, or pass on the route of said road.

That seems very plausible and specious; but when I look at the corresponding section in the general standing act I find it is much more carefully guarded; I find that it makes much more rigorous and emphatic provisions; and therefore I say it is objectionable in phrase so brief as this to supersede, as we should repeal by intendment as applicable to this particular corporation the provisions of the general act; and I think it well illustrates the unwisdom and hazard of attempting to enact for a particular party the substance of provisions found already enacted for all parties upon careful consideration. And I might add that the courts have been called upon to construe the act as it stands under my hand, to construe the section to which I have referred, and they have had some difficulty in giving it construction, but it has undergone judicial examination, and to some extent these parties know what it means. Therefore when you propose by a different form of words to vary this substance in respect of a particular party, I submit to the honorable Senator from Colorado that it is seriously objectionable.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not think there was any such design in the change of phraseology as the Senator has inferred.

Mr. CONKLING. I have imputed no design.

Mr. PADDOCK. This bill was drawn by a citizen of Wyoming Territory on behalf of this company, and was introduced by the Delegate from that Territory in the lower House. It is a bill that was not only introduced by him, but is a bill that was submitted to the Delegates of the other Territories interested, and they also approved the bill. Two of them presented it to me and asked me to introduce it, and I introduced it for them, on their account.

The VICE-PRESIDENT The question is on the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3258) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior and Secretary of War to employ additional clerks for the balance of this fiscal year to expedite the settlement of pension applications, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 4213) to appropriate money for the continuance of improvement of certain navigable waters, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE CLARK.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolutions from the House of Representatives:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 31, 1880.

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret of the death of Hon. RUSH CLARK, late a member of this House from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect to his memory the officers and members of this body will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk of this House to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the Senate, and that as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

Attest:

GEO. M. ADAMS, Clerk.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. RUSH CLARK, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Iowa.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, this is the first instance of the death of any member of either House from Iowa during his term of service, since that State was admitted to the Union.

Mr. CLARK died in this city, after an illness of a single day, on the 28th of April last, during the extra session of the present Congress. His term of service was brief; he having been first elected to the Forty-fifth Congress, and re-elected to the Forty-sixth. Because of his brief service he was not personally well known in congressional circles except to his immediate associates and those with whom he served on committees in the House. No man of his age, however, was better known in Iowa, which State he had chosen for his home when he and the State alike were young.

Mr. CLARK was born in Schellsburgh, Pennsylvania, October 1, 1834. He graduated at Jefferson College in that State in 1853 at the age of nineteen, and immediately afterward went to Iowa and became a student at law in the office of an elder brother who was in the enjoyment of a lucrative practice at the bar in Iowa City, then the capital of the State.

He was soon afterward admitted to practice in the courts, and in a short time attained a respectable rank among his associates at the bar of Iowa City, which was then, as now, composed of men of marked ability. At the urgent solicitation of personal friends he for a time edited The Republican, which was then the leading whig newspaper in the State, and continued in charge of that paper until and for a considerable period after the whig party became merged into the more aggressive and liberal party which was organized in that State in 1854 in hostility to the repeal of the Missouri compromise. His pen exerted a wide influence in changing the political complexion of the State, which until then had been under the control of the democratic party.

In 1859 Mr. CLARK was elected to the State Legislature. In 1861 he was re-elected, and at the beginning of his second term of service was elected speaker of the house, being the youngest man ever called to fill that exalted position in our State.

He carefully studied the rules of parliamentary practice. This, together with his agreeable manners, enabled him to fill the office with ability and impartiality, and secured for him the respect and esteem of his political adversaries as well as of his party friends.

At the republican congressional convention in his district, the succeeding fall, his name was presented, and he came within only six votes of receiving the nomination, which was then, as it has been since, equivalent to an election.

He continued in the practice of his profession, becoming well known in the State as an able and successful lawyer, taking no very active part in political affairs until 1875, when a senatorial election was to take place in our State. At that time the friends of my colleague had in view his election to the place to be made vacant by the voluntary retirement of Hon. George G. Wright. Mr. CLARK was called upon by the citizens of the county in which he and my colleague resided to become a candidate for the lower house of the General Assembly. His candidacy was pressed upon the ground that the county was doubtful politically with any other candidate, but that his personal popularity would render his election certain. He hesitated only because of the inconvenience to him on account of his professional engagements, but finally yielded his assent and was elected by a respectable majority, and served another term in the General Assembly. In the spring of 1876, Hon. James Wilson, who for four years had served the fifth district in the House with industry and ability, publicly announced his determination not to be again a candidate for re-election. Public opinion fixed upon Mr. CLARK as the fittest man to become his successor; he was nominated at the republican convention, and elected by a large majority.

It was no easy task for a man trained only to hard service before the courts to accustom himself readily to the daily work of the House and the daily drudgery of department labor.

Although he possessed an active and vigorous intellect, he had a delicate and nervous physical organization—too delicate for the labor he undertook; for it is the concurrent testimony of his immediate associates and late constituency that he labored constantly to familiarize himself with the great work of Congress, and at the same time to look patiently and vigilantly after the errands of his constituents in the Executive Departments.

The most of those who hear me know how much of toil, care, and anxiety are involved in this brief recital of the daily work of a faithful member of the House of Representatives; yet few persons who are not familiar with such work from personal experience or observation know the extent and growth of the necessary demand of a constituency upon their public servants in Washington; and fewer still know that these requests involve considerable journeys and a voluminous correspondence. A faithful Representative is attentive to these details—and none more so than Mr. RUSH CLARK during his brief congressional service. The labor was too great for him, and when disease seized upon him he soon yielded to its resistless power. His service, though brief, was in all respects creditable to him and was full of promise for the future. His knowledge of the law and of affairs, his practice in the courts, his familiarity with the methods of legislation, constituted for him training schools so efficient that he needed only the experience which length of service alone can give to make him a most useful member of Congress.

Observation discloses that there must be, added to ability, industry, and integrity, continued service to enable members of either House to take a conspicuous position and exert a commanding influence in the settlement of the great questions which every Congress brings before us demanding our consideration and action.

It is not too much to say of our departed friend that had such opportunities been given him he would have shown himself equal to the service. He was a fair type of that large body of professional and business men to be found in every State and in every congressional district who need but opportunity and experience in public life and length of service in either branch of Congress to impress themselves upon the legislation of the country, and the faithful and successful administration of its great affairs.

Although Mr. CLARK held but few public offices, public trusts of considerable magnitude were confided to him. He was a member of the staff of my associate, who was during the most perilous period of the late civil war governor of our State. He was for a considerable time a member of the board of regents of our State University, and also held other public trusts.

In all these he discharged the duties assigned him with ability and integrity, as he performed the duties of his broader sphere of service here with scrupulous honesty and fidelity.

In saying this of him I do not intend to distinguish him from the great body of his associates in the House. Having had some experience here in both Houses of Congress, I can truthfully say that, in my belief, instances are rarely found of those who allow their conduct to be controlled by private motives of personal gain, aside from the general good, or who legislate for their own private benefit rather than for the public advantage. And any opinion that here more than elsewhere sordid selfishness controls the conduct of public men is wholly erroneous and baseless.

Mr. CLARK at his death was about forty-five years old. Coming to our State when he was still a youth, he participated in and contributed to its rapid growth and development. He found there a population of less than a quarter of a million, and saw it grow to a million and a half. His own immediate constituency at the time of his death numbered more than two-thirds the entire population of the State when he became a citizen. Thus early identifying himself with its interests and progress, he was well known in the State, especially among our lawyers and judges and leading public men, and was highly esteemed for his ability, his benevolence, his sense of justice, and his high character as a citizen; for his fidelity to friends and courtesy to opponents. An ardent republican, he had the respect and regard of his political adversaries. Strong in his own convictions, he respected the convictions of others.

His sudden and untimely death shed a gloom over our State; and the numerous eulogies pronounced upon him through the press and public meetings indicate the strong hold he had upon our people. In his death the community in which he lived lost a valuable and public spirited citizen, his district and the State a faithful public servant, and the House in which he served one of its ablest and best representative men.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, a few hours ago I was requested to make some remarks on this occasion. I cheerfully accepted the invitation to perform the sad task. It is a pleasure, though a sad one. The history of the short life of RUSH CLARK has been given you by another more capable than I. On the 28th of April, 1879, all that was mortal of RUSH CLARK passed from earth away. Mr. CLARK presented in his physical, mental, and moral qualities a fine type of that class of men who at an early period in life bade adieu to the loved ones in their eastern homes and swelled the thronging, surging mass that crossed the Father of Waters to make a new home in the far West. He located himself in the beautiful town of Iowa City, which dots one of the wide-spreading prairies of the mighty West, where but a few years ago the Indian and the buffalo held undisputed sway, but now the happy home of thousands of "fair women and brave men." Where once was the wigwam of the child of the forest, now we behold churches erected to the living God, and schools, academies, and colleges in which are being educated a class of men and women who are to be the future rulers of this the grandest and only true republic the world ever saw. Where once was the trail of the buffalo, now may be seen thousands of miles of railroads over which the iron horse, with sinews of steel, muscles of iron, and a breath of fire dashes along over mountain heights and boundless prairies clad in nature's green and relieved by flowers of every hue, bearing in his train the commerce of a great, contented, happy, and united people. Such a country is well adapted to expanding and developing the soul, mind, and energies of its citizens.

In this country, surrounded by such people, was the head and heart of RUSH CLARK, already prepared by his early training in the mountain fastnesses of his native State, stored and expanded for the great work before him. Too much honor cannot be given to the early pioneers of the West. At an early period he saw the "star of empire" taking its course westward, and eagerly followed in the bright pathway lighted up by its beneficent and inviting rays.

At an early period his fellow-citizens saw in him future usefulness, and elevated him to the councils of their giant young State, over which he was elected its presiding officer. Nor did they wait long until they called him to a higher and more responsible position, and sent him to the national councils in the other end of this beautiful building. But the icy hand of death was laid upon his big, bounding heart, and its warm currents were chilled and ceased to beat forever, and his beaming, benignant eye closed on the bright future forever.

Mr. CLARK was an affectionate son, a fond husband, and devoted father. His beautiful, kind, and intelligent wife and his three bright, rosy-cheeked children are left without a protector. Oh, no; that is not correct. His thousands of true, devoted, and admiring friends, male and female, will be their protectors and guardians.

No one could doubt for a moment the high estimation in which he was held by his constituency if he had been present that dark night when the train arrived at his home and seen the thousands of people, irrespective of party or creed, coming to receive the casket containing the remains of their brother, and looked out upon the immense procession marching to the beat of muffled drums with sad and sorrowful hearts.

Whether at the bar discussing abstruse legal propositions with his brethren of the legal profession, or as speaker of the house of representatives of his adopted State, or as an honorable, highly respected, and laborious Representative in Congress, he always commanded the respect—ay, the love and admiration—of all with whom he came in contact.

Mr. CLARK was a decided partisan, but be it said to his honor he had no bitterness of feeling. Would that all public men would emulate his example in this respect! Always kind, courteous, and respectful to his political opponents, he won, as he deserved, friends from all sorts and classes of people. The public man who upon any occasion would engender or foster party hate, or seek to array one class or interest or one section of his common country against another, is no patriot, whatever his protestations may be, and deserves the scorn and contempt of all good men. Such a man RUSH CLARK was not; hence I honored him when alive, and respect his memory, though dead.

I have laid my wreath upon the bier of my dead brother. Small and insignificant though it be, yet it is none the less fragrant if it shall be tested by the sincerity of the sentiments of the donor. My friend, I bid thee farewell until that great day of assize shall come; that day for which all others were made; for which earth sprang from chaos, man from earth, and God from eternity.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, it may not be entirely inappropriate for me to add a few words to what has already been so well and touchingly said by those Senators who have preceded me and who knew and respected and loved him, and who would justly perpetuate his worth by these ceremonies.

I was not acquainted with RUSH CLARK. I do not know that I ever met him. I cannot speak of him therefore from that more intimate knowledge which comes from personal contact and association; but in the performance of my duty as one of the committee appointed by this body to attend his remains to their final resting-place, I learned much of his true character and of the sterling qualities of his mind and heart, of which I may speak. The grave has at least one feature which somewhat modifies its gloom. There a man is truly judged by his fellows. The sharp antagonisms, the unjust judgments of life are buried there, before the coffin is lowered, and the abilities, the impress, and the true character of the one who is to be its occupant are there justly acknowledged.

The courtesies of the grave are accorded to all, but men do not there deceive themselves or others in the estimate which they place upon the life of a fallen comrade. There you may learn his real history, his innermost life, his true character. At the home of RUSH CLARK, from the moment we reached the station till the last sad rites had been tenderly and lovingly performed, the evidences of a great sorrow pervading the entire community were unmistakable. At the very borders of the State which he had adopted as his own, we were made to feel that his influence had extended beyond the limits of the district which he more immediately represented, and that the whole State mourned for one of its truest and noblest men. All along the route to the beautiful city which had been the scene of his more active labors, we were met by strong, true men, who grieved as if the deceased had been a brother. I shall never forget the hour of our arrival at Iowa City. It was night, but the whole population had gathered to pay its tribute of respect to the dead, to testify its sympathy for the bereaved. The saddened faces of the people, seen in the light of the torches which were to guide us; the whispered orders for the disposition of his remains; the tears which fell from the eyes of sturdy men, all spoke most emphatically of the character of the man and of the place he had won for himself in the hearts of all. If deep sorrow could have restored him to life he would have lived again. It was an hour to be remembered always, and its impressions were intensified by the obsequies of the next day, when a vast concourse gathered to attend with uncovered heads the impressive funeral ceremonies, and to follow in long procession to the tomb all that was left of him who had been their reliance and pride. Neither the falling rain nor the sharp thunder could deter those who honored him from the performance in minutest detail of the last solemn rites. So he was laid away to rest in the beautiful cemetery just outside of and overlooking the city he had chosen for his home. How appropriately such a resting-place is called "God's acre." There we buried him, in the early spring-time, when the opening bud, the sprouting grain, and the springing grass were nature's assurances of the life to come.

I have said I was unacquainted with the deceased, and yet, from mingling with those who knew him best, I think I came to understand and appreciate his life and character in some degree, as if I had lived in the community that so much honored him. His was a noble and unselfish career. What words of higher commendation can be spoken of any man? He had ability of no common order, but it was used less for his own advancement than for the service of others. Ambition never blunted his sympathies, and a well-earned popularity never caused him to be forgetful of his friends. Duty was his watchword, and in its performance was his reward. With all his struggles and trials, his life was a happy one, for he consciously contributed to the happiness of others. Such men must die, but the world is the better in that they have lived.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, other Senators have spoken fully of RUSH CLARK in the relations he bore to the public whom he had served as a lawyer and a legislator. It becomes me, by reason of my more intimate personal acquaintance with him, to speak of him as he was known to those who, like myself, had the pleasure and the advantage of frequent, close, and friendly intercourse with him.

He represented in the Forty-fifth Congress and until his death in the Forty-sixth Congress the congressional district in which I live. I was one of his constituents; he was my fellow-townsman, my neighbor, and I am glad to be able to say my friend. He was by some two years an older resident of our young State than myself. When I went to reside in Iowa City, in 1855, I found him there, a young man and a young lawyer, struggling for and gradually winning, by his knowledge of the law, his close attention to his business, his energy, and his perseverance, that high rank in his profession to which he afterward attained. When he came to Iowa, his capital, or as we sometimes express it in our quaint western way, his "outfit" was his head, his heart, and his hands—a clear head, a stout heart, and willing hands.

After closing his collegiate life in Pennsylvania, he judged, as I think wisely, that there was a better chance for him to win his way in the battle of life in the new, broad, free West, than in the older, more crowded, and I trust I may say without offense, less liberal older States. He knew well that the journey of life for him was not to be an easy, pleasant travel over a broad, smooth highway, but a tedious and painful progress over a rough and rugged path, every foot of which was to be made by his own labor and perseverance. He did not quail at the prospect, but went to work manfully and persistently. He met, as such men almost always do meet, many obstacles in his way; but he met them boldly, overcame them, and left them behind him monuments of his energy and courage.

Before his death these qualities had brought him to where his pathway was broader and smoother, and the outlook for his future more bright and cheering. And then he died; died in the prime of life; died of overwork; died of the earnest and exhausting labor he gave to the interests of his country and his constituents, which was greater than his physical powers, never strong, could endure.

My colleague has told of the different honorable positions held by Mr. CLARK by the favor of those among whom he lived, and how he performed the duties attached to them. He held at one time a position—not by election, but by my appointment—that brought us into close and cordial relations. I had the honor to hold, during the first three years of our civil war—the war of the rebellion as it is in my judgment properly called—the office of governor of the loyal State of Iowa, and thereby was charged with the duty of raising and organizing the volunteers called for from that State for the preservation of the Union. I needed to aid me in that work the services of some bright, earnest, active young men. Mr. CLARK was one of them; my colleague (I trust he will pardon me) was another. Largely by their aid and the aid of others associated with them in giving form and direction to the patriotism of our young men, the quota of Iowa's soldiers was always full; and I must be allowed to say in this presence, where are men who fought on the same side with them, and men who fought against them, no better or braver soldiers fought under either flag in that unhappy strife.

As a citizen RUSH CLARK was orderly, law-abiding, and public-spirited; as a neighbor, kindly, generous, and helpful; as a friend, true and trusty; as a husband and father, kind, loving, and devoted.

The scene on the arrival of his remains at his home showed the estimation in which he was held by his neighbors, those who knew him best and to whom his sudden death had given a great and painful shock. It was late at night when the train carrying his corpse reached our quiet town, and yet the depot and the street between that and his home were filled by his friends and neighbors who came to testify by their presence their respect for him and their sorrow for his loss, and who on the next day followed him to our quiet cemetery where his mortal remains "rest in peace."

When we look about us and see death choosing his victims, we sometimes wonder why the idler is left, and the active, earnest worker is called away; why those in the pride and vigor of their manhood are taken and those older and perhaps weary of life are permitted to remain. We do not know why. We know that God who does all things well, so wills it, and bow in submission to His will. We only know that he to whose memory we do honor to-day has gone before us to learn the mysteries of that other life in which we all believe, as to which many fear so much, and as to which all hope so much and know so little.

If it be true, as many believe, that the best service we can render here to the Great Father of all is to give strength to the weak and help to the helpless of His children, then my friend has done his proper work well.

If it be true, as many believe, that in the other life we shall be assigned to do the work for which our mental and moral development here has best fitted us, then my friend will be given there important work to do.

If it be true, as many believe, and it is becoming very pleasant for me so to believe, that in the other life we shall know and enjoy the society of those whom we knew and loved here, then my friend who has gone before is enjoying pleasant communings in his new home and waits with patient longing the coming of those whom he loved and left behind.

I move, Mr. President, the adoption of the resolution offered by my colleague.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I move now that, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 3, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF JOURNAL.

Mr. SPEER. I find bills introduced by me yesterday, Mr. Speaker, have not been referred as I intended. The fault is mine as much as that of anybody. I wish to have the correction made at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will indicate the bills to which he refers.

Mr. SPEER. The bill (H. R. No. 4038) for the relief of E. Pace, of Jackson County, Georgia, is referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I desire its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means. The bill (H. R. No. 4040) for the relief of James Evans, of Lumpkin County, Georgia, is also referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I desire its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means. I desire the same change of reference of the bill (H. R. No. 4042) for the relief of W. L. Vaughan from Invalid Pensions Committee to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The change of reference will be made in accordance with the request of the gentleman from Georgia, there being no objection.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Journal, as corrected, was then approved.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

On motion of Mr. DUNNELL, Mr. Charles A. Gilman, lieutenant-governor of Minnesota, was admitted to the privileges of the floor for this day.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I move by unanimous consent that the privileges of the floor be accorded to Mr. Charles S. Parnell, a member of the British Parliament.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will also include the admission to the privileges of the floor of Mr. Dillon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the admission to the privileges of the floor of Mr. Parnell and Mr. Dillon?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PRINTING OF BILLS ON MONDAY.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Yesterday I introduced a bill in the morning hour, which, on motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] was read. The bill having been read, I wish to know whether it should not have been printed in the RECORD this morning?

The SPEAKER. It should not have been printed in the RECORD. The real object of calling for the reading of bills on Monday morning is to consume the time. The gentleman can readily understand if every bill introduced on Monday was read the RECORD would be overloaded.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I understand that, and merely made the inquiry for information.

The SPEAKER. The practice is uniform not to print bills introduced on Monday, although they may have been read to the House. Nor indeed can a request be received during the morning hour for the printing of a bill in the RECORD, but such request must be made subsequent to the morning hour.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DAVIS, of California, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture:

Whereas throughout the greater portion of the United States west of the one hundredth meridian the climatic conditions and the nature of the soil are so different from those of the Atlantic States as to require a very different system of agriculture; and

Whereas the good or ill success of certain crops or certain varieties of stock in the Eastern States gives no criterion of their value to the Pacific States; and

Whereas the Agricultural Department as heretofore administered, and the agricultural reports as heretofore published, have been devoted almost exclusively to the wants of the region east of the one hundredth meridian: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Agriculture be directed to inquire into the most feasible method of extending the benefits of the Agricultural Department over that portion of the United States west of the one hundredth meridian, either by experimental farms, experimental stations, by closer connection with State boards of agriculture, or by special bureau in said Department devoted to the district above named, and allotting a portion of the annual agricultural reports to the information furnished by this bureau, and that said committee be directed to report to this House the result of their inquiry.

WEST POINT, VIRGINIA, A PORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. BEALE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4214) to amend and re-enact sections 2552 and 2553 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, with the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

IMMIGRATION OF CHINESE.

Mr. WILLIS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, on the 25th day of February, 1878, a resolution was unanimously reported to the House of Representatives requesting the President of the United States to open correspondence immediately with the governments of China and Great Britain, with a view of securing a change or abrogation of all stipulations in existing treaties which permit the unlimited immigration of the Chinese to the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform this House what steps have been taken in the direction indicated by said resolution, and also to communicate any other information upon this subject as he may deem proper.

Mr. WILLIS. I move it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WILSON. Should not that be sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs? The Committee on Foreign Affairs have now a kindred subject under consideration.

Mr. COX. I hope my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs will let it go to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WILLIS. It should go to that committee, as it already has the subject under consideration.

The preamble and resolution were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred last Thursday a resolution asking for information from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury in regard to public buildings, have directed me to report the same back with a substitute. Under the rules the resolution must be reported back within one week.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reports back under the rules, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, a substitute for a resolution asking for information referred to that committee. The substitute will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds—

First. The location and character of all public buildings in process of construction or which have been completed under his direction within the past three years.

Second. The original and extended limitation by law, together with the actual cost of such buildings as have been completed within the time mentioned.

Third. The original or extended limitation by law, the entire cost to date, and the estimated cost of completion of buildings in process of construction.

Fourth. The reasons why, in his judgment, such buildings have cost or will cost, if such be the fact, more than the amount fixed by law as an aggregate limitation.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, when replies to the foregoing shall have been received, are hereby directed to report the same to the House, together with such recommendations, accompanied by bill or otherwise, as the interests of the public service may require, and in furtherance of this object the committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers.

The substitute was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH AUSTIN.

Mr. CARPENTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4215) granting a pension to Joseph Austin, of Milford, county of Dickinson, State of Iowa; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ABOLITION OF FORT ABERCROMBIE RESERVATION.

Mr. WASHBURN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4216) abolishing the military reservation of Fort Abercrombie, in the State of Minnesota, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the lands embraced therein made subject to homestead and pre-emption entry and sale the same as other public lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF MESSENGER.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I desire to make a unanimous report from the Committee of Accounts to pay the messenger to the official reporters, and to ask for its adoption at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Johan C. Kondrup at the rate of $1,000 per annum during the present session of Congress for services as messenger to the official reporters of debates, and that the same be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT BILL.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. What is known as the steamboat bill was made the special order for to-day. I understand one other special order was made, but neither has been taken up for the reason that the House has gone to the consideration of the revision of the rules. What I wish to ask is whether the special order, being a continuing one from day to day, will lose any of its rights if it should be taken up to-day?

The SPEAKER. Special orders will be taken up in their order of precedence, and where they are continuing special orders from day to day they do not lose any of their special privileges by not being taken up the first day for which they are set for consideration.

Mr. KENNA. That is precisely the information I desire to have from the Speaker. This is a continuing order from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Then it does not lose any of its rights, but will come up in the order in which it stands among the special orders.

AMERICAN EPHEMERIS AND NAUTICAL ALMANAC.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to make a report from the Printing Committee. I am instructed to report back, with an amendment, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 93) for printing the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac. I ask the present consideration of the joint resolution and amendment.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there shall be printed annually at the Government Printing Office 1,500 copies of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac and of the papers supplementary thereto, of which 100 shall be for the use of the Senate, 400 for the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for the public service, to be distributed by the Navy Department.

SEC. 2. That additional copies of the Ephemeris and of the Nautical Almanac extracted therefrom may be ordered by the Navy Department for sale at the cost of paper and printing: Provided, That all moneys received from such sale shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation for public printing.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In section 2, line 3, strike out the words "Navy Department," and insert in lieu thereof "Secretary of the Navy;" and in the same line strike out the words "at the cost of paper and printing;" so that, if amended, it will read:

SEC. 2. That additional copies of the Ephemeris and of the Nautical Almanac extracted therefrom may be ordered by the Secretary of the Navy, for sale, &c.

Mr. WILSON. The Ephemeris, when published, will constitute a manual which is essential to the navigator and the astronomer. Indeed, it is said to be more indispensable than the sounding-line or the fog-whistle.

With a view that members may be fully informed as to the importance of the immediate passage of this resolution, I will ask to have read two letters from Professor Simon Newcomb; but if no member desires to have them read, I will ask to have them printed in the RECORD. Professor Newcomb is so distinguished in his profession that these letters, coming from him, will throw a great deal of valuable information upon the subject, and constitute an interesting page in our legislative history.

Mr. GARFIELD. To save time, I suggest that the letters from Professor Newcomb, instead of being read, be printed in the RECORD. This thing ought to be done, and I hope the House will not delay it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the papers being printed in the RECORD.

The letters of Professor Newcomb are as follows:

NAUTICAL ALMANAC OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 10, 1880.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to submit the following remarks on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 93) referred to you.

1. The Ephemeris, of which the printing is here provided for, furnishes the original official predictions of the celestial motions used in the preparation of almanacs and calendars, the prediction of times and seasons, and the determination of positions both on the land and on the sea. It is the indispensable manual of the navigator, and of the astronomer who wishes either to determine his position on the land, or the prediction of the heavenly bodies. Some publication of this sort is issued by each of the principal nations of Europe.

2. A small edition is printed two or three years in advance for the use of ships going on long voyages, and astronomers who wish to ascertain the course of eclipses and other astronomical phenomena. The principal edition for each year should be published early in the year before. The printing has heretofore been done by order of the Navy Department. But the reduction in the Department printing fund made four years ago has resulted in the annual exhaustion of this fund before the time for printing the large edition comes round. For instance, the principal demand for the Ephemeris for 1880 commenced in May last. But owing to the exhaustion of the printing fund no copies could be supplied until August. The result was that for the period of two months ships going to sea were unable to supply themselves with a manual which, though costing only fifty cents, is more necessary to safe navigation than the sounding-line or the fog-whistle.

3. After long and careful consideration of this subject, and a discussion with different authorities, it has seemed to me that the only way to guard against these difficulties is to provide for the annual printing by some such method as that indicated in the resolution. The publication being an annual necessity ought not to depend upon an appropriation for miscellaneous and unforeseen printing.

4. Number of copies required.—The public service proper, including naval ships, the Naval Academy, the Light-House Board, the revenue marine, and coast and interior surveys of all kinds requires annually from three hundred and fifty to four hundred copies.

About four hundred copies are distributed to colleges, observatories, and public libraries, and distinguished astronomers. There is, with the progress of the country, a continually increasing demand from educational institutions.

Members of Congress frequently receive applications for copies from their constituents, which it has generally been the unpleasant duty of the office to decline. Still I think one hundred copies, fifty for the Senate and fifty for the House, would meet all requirements of this class.

The Ephemeris has a permanent value as a record of celestial phenomena, and applications for complete sets are frequent. Two hundred copies should be kept for future wants.

The total number required will therefore be:—

Public service:
Public service proper	400
Institutions, &c	400
	800
For members of Congress	100
For future demands	200
Total	1,100

Besides these, from three hundred and fifty to four hundred copies are annually sold, which under the proposed arrangement would be ordered by the Navy Department.

There is also an abridgment entitled The American Nautical Almanac, of which thirty-five hundred copies are annually printed for the use of navigators.

Under the new arrangement these would be ordered by the Department.

5. It seems to me that the proceeds of these sales should be returned to the fund at the expense of which the copies were printed; hence, section 2. But I respectfully recommend the omission of the words "at the cost of paper and printing," owing to the inconvenience of variable price with odd cents, and the loss of booksellers' commission. The large volume is now sold by booksellers at $1.25, and the small one by agents at fifty cents, which is a convenient arrangement.

6. The supplementary papers provided for in section 1 comprise tables and investigations required for the preparation and improvement of the work. The Superintendent has devoted his life principally to these investigations, because he considered them one of the most important and useful astronomical works of the day, and his improvements have generally been adopted in the leading astronomical ephemerides of Europe as well as in our own.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SIMON NEWCOMB,
Professor U. S. N., Superintendent Nautical Almanac.

Hon. BENJAMIN WILSON,
House Representatives.

NAUTICAL ALMANAC OFFICE, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1880.

DEAR SIR: Since seeing you I have conferred with the Navy Department and Government Printing Office and others respecting the best form for the joint resolution to print our Ephemeris. I think the number provided for in the resolution may stand without detriment, because the cost of printing when the plates are once in press is only about sixty cents a copy, and there are schools, colleges, and individuals in nearly every congressional district who desire the work.

In section 2, line 3, would it not be well to substitute "Secretary of the Navy" for "Navy Department?"

In lines 3 and 4 I hope the words "at the cost of paper and printing" will be stricken out for the reason already given you.

I find on inquiry at the printing office that the words I suggested at the end of the resolution are not necessary, as the Public Printer will be authorized to credit the allotment to the Navy Department as the words now stand. This is all that is required.

Yours, very respectfully,

SIMON NEWCOMB.

Hon. BENJAMIN WILSON,
House Representatives.

The amendment of the committee was adopted.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EDUCATION IN ALASKA.

Mr. BRENTS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be instructed to inquire what, if any, provisions have been made for the education of youth in Alaska, and what, if any, additional measures are required, and to report the same by bill or otherwise.

LABORERS UPON GOVERNMENT WORKS.

Mr. BARBER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1129) for the relief of certain laborers employed upon Government works; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WRITS OF ERROR IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 905) in relation to writs of error to the supreme courts of the Territories in capital cases.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I object to the present consideration of the bill. I do not object to its reference.

Mr. KNOTT. The bill has been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, and it has unanimously instructed me to make the request this morning that the bill be passed.

Mr. MAGINNIS. On behalf of the territorial Delegates I must object to this bill. It changes the whole jurisdiction in the Territories to meet a particular case. I object to general legislation of that character.

Mr. KNOTT. Then I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

FORFEITURE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 197) to declare forfeited certain public lands conditionally granted to aid in the construction of railroad and telegraph lines; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN TAYLOR.

Mr. COX also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4217) granting a pension to John Taylor, late of Battery M, Third New York Light Artillery; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HENRY C. DE AHNA.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3484) for the relief of Henry C. De Ahna, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN LANCASTER, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4218) providing for the purchase of a site and erecting thereon a post-office and revenue office in the city of Lancaster, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE HEARD.

On motion of Mr. PHILIPS, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 309) for the relief of George Heard, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CLOCK OVER SPEAKER'S DESK.

Mr. ACKLEN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to have placed over the Speaker's desk a clock of like size and quality to the one now in use in this Hall; the expense of carrying out this resolution to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now insist upon my demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour will begin at two minutes past one o'clock, and during the morning hour reports of a public nature are in order from committees. The call rests with the Committee on the Judiciary.

TIME OF SERVICE OF JURORS.

The SPEAKER. There was pending at the close of the last morning hour for public business a bill (H. R. No. 3336) to prescribe the time of service for jurors.

Mr. HERBERT. The previous question had been demanded upon that bill.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question was pending at the close of the morning hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no person shall serve as a petit juror in any court of the United States more than three weeks during any one year: Provided, however, That jurors may sit as long as may be necessary to decide causes the trial of which may have been begun before the expiration of such term of service.

SEC. 2. Judges shall provide, according to the mode of drawing of juries now in force, for the drawing of such additional juries as may be necessary to complete the business of courts which sit more than three weeks.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect within one month after its approval.

The SPEAKER. Tellers had been ordered upon the demand for the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill. The House had divided and the tellers reported the vote, which showed that there was less than a quorum voting, and the point of order was made that no quorum had voted. The morning hour expiring, the bill went over. The tellers will now resume their places and the vote will be again taken.

Mr. HERBERT and Mr. CONGER as tellers then resumed their places.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 126, noes 20.

Mr. CONGER. That, I believe, is not a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will vote in the affirmative, making ayes 127, noes 20, which is a quorum.

Mr. CONGER. I did not intend to make the point that no quorum voted, but will content myself with calling for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered, which was upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 21 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask that the other side be counted.

The negative vote was counted, resulting, noes 102.

So the affirmative not being one-fifth, the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. HERBERT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. LAPHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask that there be printed the usual number of copies of the official report of brief addresses made before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, January 24, 1880, on the question of woman suffrage.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is it in order to ask that that report be read before we are called upon to vote upon the question of printing it?

The SPEAKER. It is, unless objection is made.

Mr. LAPHAM. I hope there will be no objection to printing this paper.

Mr. WILLITS. That is not the report of a committee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] can ask for the reading of the report of the committee, which was a verbal report.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am calling for the reading of a paper that it is asked shall be printed.

Mr. WILLITS. I object to that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I insist upon its being read.

The SPEAKER. The House is called upon to determine the question of printing the paper which has been sent to the Clerk's desk. The Clerk will read Rule 141.

Mr. LAPHAM. I am, myself, quite willing that it should be read. I think the House would be instructed by listening to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House.

Mr. WILLITS. If I understood the ruling of the Chair some days ago, in regard to a demand then made that the report and testimony of an investigating committee be read, when the question was upon ordering it to be printed, the Chair ruled that the testimony could not be read, but that the report could be. Now I submit that the report in this case is simply a verbal report, asking that these papers be printed. Therefore the demand for the reading can relate only to the report which was made, and not to the entire matter which the report asks to have printed.

Mr. LAPHAM. A committee of this House has deemed this discussion of so much importance to themselves in the discharge of their duty that they ask of the House the usual courtesy to have the report of the discussion printed. I trust there will be no objection on the part of any member of the House to that being done.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I would remind the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLITS] that the other day when the question was before the House in regard to printing some papers that were intended to be referred to the Committee of Elections, it was held that when the reading of the paper was demanded it was necessary to have it read. I am now disposed to require that the same ruling shall be applied to this paper. I do not know what is in the paper; I do not know whether I am willing to have it printed or not. I insist that it shall be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The case referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is not an analogous case with the one now before the House. The matter to which the gentleman refers came before the House as a question of privilege. This matter comes in as a report from a committee. Still, the Chair thinks that under the practice of the House, where it is called upon to order the printing of a report, the report should be read if called for. This comes in as a report, does it not?

Mr. WILLITS. I do not understand it so.

Mr. KNOTT. I think I can briefly state the case precisely. The paper now lying upon the Clerk's desk is simply a report of some speeches made a few days since before the Committee on the Judiciary, at a called meeting of that committee. The committee, by a majority of its members, now ask that the same be printed for the use of the committee. That is the whole of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recollect any similar request of this kind, for the exclusive printing of speeches delivered before a committee.

Mr. WILLITS. During the last Congress, the arguments made before the Committee on Patents were printed under the instructions of the House, and made quite a large volume.

Mr. LAPHAM. I will state that these addresses are not voluminous, and the expense of printing them will be trifling.

Mr. REAGAN. If we are to enter upon the business of printing the voluntary speeches made before committees, we shall have a lively time in printing arguments that the House may not want to hear at all.

The SPEAKER. The practice, however, is not infrequent for committees to ask that testimony taken and also remarks made before them may be printed. This would seem to be a case of that kind.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I think there is a clear distinction between a report of a committee presented for the action of the House and the request of a committee to print matter for the use of the committee. I believe that according to the practice of the House heretofore, when committees have desired for their benefit copies of matter of this kind so as to avoid the inconvenience of manuscript copies or of a single copy which must pass from one member to another, it has been usual, out of deference to the wishes of the committee, to grant the privilege of printing. I know that this courtesy has been extended to the Committee of Claims upon some occasions; and I believe the records will show the practice of the House to be that wherever a committee thinks the printing of any matter, whether already in existence or in anticipation, would facilitate the action of a committee in pursuing the investigation intrusted to it, the request is granted. In this case the object of asking the printing, as I understand, is to facilitate the investigation of the committee. It is not a matter that they desire to make public or to put into the hands of the House. I think the request of the committee should be granted without the reading of the matter proposed to be printed, because it is not offered now for the information or action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] in one respect—that it is unusual to refuse such a request as this when made by a committee. But the rule says, "a paper." This is certainly "a paper" reported from the Committee on the Judiciary; and the Chair, in obedience to Rule 141, is ready to submit to a vote of the House the question whether the paper shall be read or not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee. There is a large amount of matter printed which in my judgment never ought to be, costing large sums of money. If this is a question to be determined alone by the judgment of the Committee on the Judiciary, then there ought to be some rule which would allow committees to order the printing of any matter, without submitting it to the House. But if the question is to be submitted to members of the House whether we should incur the expense of having this document printed, I insist that I cannot discharge my duty here without knowing what is in the paper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit to the House the question whether the paper shall be read?

Mr. LAPHAM. I am informed by a member of the Committee of Ways and Means that that committee has the privilege of ordering the printing of just such discussions as this, and that it is done under a rule.

The SPEAKER. That is under the order of the House.

Mr. LAPHAM. Yes, sir; but I am showing what is the practice. The debates on the sugar question now going on before the Committee of Ways and Means are being printed for the use of that committee. Now, in the present case, here is a discussion of very great importance to a vast body of American citizens. They have been heard before the committee; but only a portion of the members of the committee were present at that discussion. We desire the discussion put in print for our use, and I am sure the House will not deny that request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit to the House the question whether this paper, under the circumstances stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM,] who introduces the subject from the Committee on the Judiciary, shall be read. The Chair thinks that this is in the nature of testimony, although it is not sworn testimony.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to ask a question. If the House should order that the paper be read, will it then be in order for the gentleman reporting it to withdraw it?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to any——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman presenting the paper can withdraw it, of course.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to say that I suspect there is an intention here to consume the morning hour in order to keep out important matters which the Committee on the Judiciary desire to report.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to say that the gentleman has no warrant for making any such assertion.

The question being put whether the paper presented by Mr. LAPHAM should be read, it was decided in the negative—ayes 3, noes not counted.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. LAPHAM that the paper be printed, it was agreed to.

Mr. LAPHAM moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 2701 a bill (H. R. No. 4219) to amend sections 1, 2, 3, and 10 of an act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and regulating the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1875.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. All points of order will be reserved.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the first section of an act entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1. That the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority, or in which controversy the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners, or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States, in which the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value aforesaid, or a controversy between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States, or a controversy between citizens of a State and foreign states, citizens or subjects, in which the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value aforesaid, and shall have exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, except as otherwise provided by law, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the crimes and offenses cognizable by them. But no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another in any civil action before a circuit or district court, and no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against any person by any original process or proceeding in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving such process or commencing such proceedings, except as hereinafter provided. And where the controversy is between citizens of different States, suit shall be brought only in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant. Nor shall any circuit or district court have cognizance of any suit founded on contract in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover thereon if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange. And the circuit courts shall also have appellate jurisdiction from the district courts under the regulations and restrictions prescribed by law."

That the second section of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That any suit of a civil nature, either at law or in equity, of which the circuit courts of the United States are given original jurisdiction by the last preceding section, but which may be now pending, or which may be hereafter brought in any State court, may be removed by the defendant or defendants therein to the circuit court of the United States for the proper district; and when in any suit mentioned in this section there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States and which can be fully determined as between them, then either one or more of the defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district. And where a suit is now pending or may be hereafter brought in any State court in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another State, such citizen of another State, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, may remove such suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district at any time before the trial thereof by filing an affidavit in such State court setting forth that he has reason to believe, and does believe, that from prejudice or local influence he will not be able to obtain justice in such State court."

That section 3 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That whenever any party entitled to remove any suit mentioned in the next preceding section, except in such cases as are provided for in the last clause of said section, may desire to remove such suit from a State court to the circuit court of the United States, he may make and file a petition in such suit in such State court at any time before the defendant is required by the laws of the State or the rule of the State court in which such suit is brought to answer or plead to the declaration or complaint of the plaintiff for the removal of such suit into the circuit court to be held in the district where such suit is pending, and shall make and file therewith a bond, with good and sufficient surety, for his or their entering in such circuit court, on the first day of its then next session, a copy of the record in such suit, and for paying all costs that may be awarded by the said circuit court if said court shall hold that such suit was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto, and also for there appearing and entering special bail in such suit if special bail was originally requisite therein. It shall then be the duty of the State court to accept said petition and bond and proceed no further in such suit, and any bail that may have been originally taken shall be discharged; and the said copy being entered as aforesaid in said circuit court of the United States, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in the said circuit court; and if in any action commenced in a State court the title of land be concerned, and the parties are citizens of the same State, and the matter in dispute exceed the sum or value of $2,000, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value being made to appear, one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants, before the trial, may state to the court, and make affidavit if the court require it, that he or they claim and shall rely upon a right or title to the land under a grant from a State, and produce the original grant, or an exemplification of it, except where the loss of public records shall put it out of his or their power, and shall move that any one or more of the adverse party inform the court whether he or they claim a right or title to the land under a grant from some other State, the party or parties so required shall give such information, or otherwise not to be allowed to plead such grant or give it in evidence upon the trial; and if he or they inform that he or they do claim under such grant, any one or more of the party moving for such information may then, on petition and bond, as hereinbefore mentioned in this act, remove the cause for trial to the circuit court of the United States next to be holden in such district; and any one of either party removing the cause shall not be allowed to plead or give evidence of any other title than that by him or them stated as aforesaid as the ground of his or their claim; and the trial of issues of fact in the circuit courts shall, in all suits except those of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, be by jury.

"That the circuit courts of the United States shall not take original cognizance of any suit of a civil nature, either at common law or in equity, between a corporation created or organized by or under the laws of any State and a citizen of any State in which such corporation at the time the cause of action accrued may have been carrying on any business authorized by the law creating it, except in like cases in which said courts are authorized by this act to take original cognizance of suits between citizens of the same State. Nor shall any such suit between such a corporation and a citizen or citizens of a State in which it may be doing business be removed to any circuit court of the United States, except in like cases in which such removal is authorized by the foregoing provision in suits between citizens of the same States."

That section 10 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act, and section 640 of the Revised Statutes, be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas what action he proposes to take on this bill at this time?

Mr. CULBERSON. I propose, by request of the Committee on the Judiciary, to have the bill now considered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to make this request to the gentleman from Texas. The bill which was reported at the extra session and debated for some weeks in regard to the removal of State causes was finally placed upon the public Calendar in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where to-day it stands at the head of the Calendar. As soon as we get through with the discussion of the report from the Committee on Rules we will go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and take up that bill. I now ask my friend from Texas, as this bill incorporates a part of the bill I have referred to, that instead of being now considered it shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to be taken up there at the same time and considered in connection with the bill of the last session to which I have already referred.

I will state further, Mr. Speaker, that I am content with the provisions in this bill, and have no objection to anything which appears in it, but I am somewhat apprehensive if this bill is considered and passed at this time it will weaken that other bill, which goes much further and in my judgment is of much more importance to the people than the bill now before the House. I therefore ask that this bill be sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, there to be taken up in connection with the other proposition.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have no authority to agree to that from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will my friend allow me to make a motion so that the question may be submitted to the House?

Mr. CULBERSON. I must decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then, Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the legislation provided for in this bill; but this only seeks to accomplish by piecemeal what will be accomplished by wholesale, when we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, by the passage of that other bill.

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And for that purpose I make this point of order, for the purpose of having it considered in connection with the bill now pending before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The last clause of Rule 48 is to this effect:

No bill or resolution shall, at any time, be amended by annexing thereto, or incorporating therewith, any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

I wish to put this question to the Speaker. The bill I have referred to, and which has been under discussion, and is now in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, relates to the removal of causes from State courts. It regulates the transfer of causes from State courts. The second section of this bill covers the same field to a large extent covered by the bill to which I have referred, and which is pending in the Committee of the Whole. I raise that question of order.

The SPEAKER. The bill to which the gentleman alludes is not being amended by this proposition. That other bill has quite a different status before the House from that which is occupied by the bill which is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. This is in the morning hour and before the House, while that is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The rule to which the gentleman refers does not apply, that the Chair can see, in the slightest degree.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to put this question as a parliamentary inquiry to the Speaker: Where a committee has matured a bill and placed it before the House, and the House has entered upon the consideration of that bill and referred it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, can another committee, by making its report in the morning hour, cover the same ground exactly occupied by that other bill reported from a different committee by bringing in an independent bill in the morning hour for the purpose of having it considered separately and independently as a separate measure, although embracing provisions exactly of the same nature as the other bill which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of order, but it is a question for the House to determine. It is a question of propriety and a choice between two committees. Two committees can report to the House bills of a similar character. The rules say, however, that two bills shall not be run together, one as an amendment to the other. This is in a separate shape, and comes regularly from the Committee on the Judiciary as a report from that committee during its regular call in the morning hour. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before making any remarks explanatory of the provisions of the pending bill, I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute reported from the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is the amendment reported from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. CULBERSON. No, sir; it is not reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, but by agreement in that committee each member was permitted to submit any amendment which he chose to the pending proposition. I offer this amendment in my individual capacity.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all from the word "follows," in line 47, down to the word "and," in line 54, and insert:

SEC. 2. That any suit of a civil nature at law or in equity arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made or which shall be made under their authority of which the circuit courts of the United States are given original jurisdiction by the preceding section, which may now be pending or which may hereafter be brought in any State court, may be removed by the defendant or defendants therein to the circuit court of the United States for the proper district whenever it is made to appear from the application of such defendant or defendants that his or their defense depends in whole or in part upon a correct construction of some provision of the Constitution or law of the United States or treaty made by their authority. And other suits of a civil nature at law or in equity of which the circuit courts of the United States are given jurisdiction by the preceding section, and which are now pending or which may hereafter be brought in any State court, may be removed into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district by the defendant or defendants therein: Provided, Such defendant or defendants are non-residents of the State in which the suit is pending.

Mr. ROBINSON. Before the gentleman from Texas proceeds with his remarks will he let me ask him a question?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The statement made by the gentleman a little while ago was not distinctly heard here, and I should like to know now whether the gentleman from Texas offers that amendment as coming from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. CULBERSON. No, sir; I do not. I stated a little while ago that I offered it on my own volition.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then the gentleman offers the amendment on his individual responsibility?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, sir; on the authority granted by the committee to the members of that committee to offer any amendment they might think proper when the bill came up for consideration before the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I only wish to have that fact stated in the hearing of the House.

Mr. CULBERSON addressed the House. Before he had concluded his remarks,

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, said: I make the point of order that the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

[Mr. CULBERSON resumed and concluded his remarks during the morning hour of the following day. His speech appears in full on page 700.]

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 317) for the relief of Captain J. B. Campbell; and

An act (S. No. 695) for the relief of Michael Granery, Nicholas Wax, and Moliere Lange.

PAYMENT FOR LEGAL HOLIDAYS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Public Printer, relative to the payment of employés for legal holidays; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

FORT CLARK, TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to purchase of site of Fort Clark, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LANDS SOLD FOR DIRECT TAXES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution of the House of January 16, 1880, calling for information as to the amount of money covered into the Treasury as the proceeds of the sale of lands for direct taxes in the State of South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

SINKING FUND FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of the Treasurer of the United States, showing the operation of the sinking fund pertaining to the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, asked consent that Colonel Alexander Campbell, of West Virginia, be allowed the privileges of the floor for the remainder of this week.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio, for two days.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the proposed revision of the rules reported from the Committee on Rules. Pending that motion, I move that all debate upon the proposed Rule No. XI, now under consideration and all amendments thereto, be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I hope the gentleman will permit me to offer an amendment to that motion.

Mr. McMAHON. Should not the motion be limited to pending amendments?

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to confine his motion to the paragraph of the rule under consideration, not to apply it to the whole rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There are forty-seven paragraphs in Rule XI. If it shall be not the pleasure of the majority of the House to close debate and proceed to vote upon these rules, I shall be content. But it does seem to me that after we have had one month's debate upon these rules, we might at least be content with an hour or two of debate on each rule. We certainly have had that much debate upon Rule XI. The members of the Committee on Rules do not desire to discuss that rule any further.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. By the unanimous instruction of my committee, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I desire to offer an amendment to one clause of Rule XI.

Mr. BLACKBURN. My motion, if adopted, will not cut off amendments. It will simply cut off debate.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to limit the debate upon Rule XI, and upon all amendments thereto, to ten minutes.

Mr. CHALMERS. Cannot that be divided?

Mr. CONGER. If the object is to have any debate on the different paragraphs of each rule, there is as much necessity for debate on the paragraphs which have not yet been reached as there was upon any which we have acted upon. I object to the motion to limit debate.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have made the motion in deference to requests from members on both sides of the House.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would suggest to the gentleman to make his motion to limit debate to ten minutes on each clause.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There are forty-seven clauses of Rule XI, and if ten minutes' time is allowed for debate on each clause, by the aid of a little mathematical calculation gentlemen will see that it will require one week to dispose of that one rule.

Mr. HAWLEY. Not more than one clause in ten will be debated.

Mr. LAPHAM. Let the proposition be made so as to apply to such clauses as amendments may be offered to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If my motion is agreed to, it will not cut off amendments; it will only require members to vote upon the amendments without discussing them.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. May I ask the gentleman whether, in case any clause of Rule XI shall be debated before clause 19 is reached, will not all debate upon clause 19 be prevented provided ten minutes has been occupied in debating any previous clause?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes. If my motion is agreed to it will cut off all debate but ten minutes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That was my understanding and therefore I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand the motion applies to Rule XI only.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Only to Rule XI.

Mr. CHALMERS. I move to amend so as to limit debate on any clause to which amendments may be offered to ten minutes.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. CHALMERS, and it was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 54, noes 61.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. BLACKBURN to limit debate upon Rule XI to ten minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to amend so that all debate upon any substantial amendment be limited to ten minutes, not to formal amendments.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. BLACKBURN to limit debate upon Rule XI and all amendments thereto to ten minutes; and upon a division there were—ayes 92, noes 24.

Mr. PAGE. I raise the point that no quorum has voted, and I ask for tellers. I ask also that the question be stated again by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is to limit all debate upon Rule XI and amendments thereto to ten minutes.

Mr. PAGE. I do not think the House understood the question, and I ask for tellers.

Mr. CONGER. There are thirty-nine paragraphs of Rule XI upon which not one word has been said, and it is proposed now to cut off all explanation or debate upon those paragraphs.

The SPEAKER. The House is now dividing upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.] No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint Mr. BLACKBURN, of Kentucky, and Mr. PAGE, of California, to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 90.

Before the negative vote was taken,

Mr. CHALMERS said: I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHALMERS. Is not the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] equivalent to a proposition to suspend the rule which allows five minutes' debate upon every amendment offered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the Clerk to read the latter clause of Rule 60.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, further, That the House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph of a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph, or at their election upon the pending amendments only.

Mr. CHALMERS. That relates to limiting debate upon pending amendments. The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky is equivalent to a motion to suspend the rule so as to cut off all debate upon any amendments that may be offered, and that requires a two-thirds vote.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order to move to suspend the rules to-day.

Mr. CHALMERS. I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is a proposition to suspend the rules, and therefore not in order.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will conclude their count, after which the Chair will rule upon the point of order raised by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.]

The tellers resumed and concluded the count, which resulted—ayes 90, noes 33.

The SPEAKER. It has been the custom of the House to do what is proposed to be done by the gentleman from Kentucky. But if the point is contested, the question of order would turn on the language of the rule providing that "the House may by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph of a bill, close debate upon such section or paragraph, or at their election upon the pending amendments only." The Chair thinks the meaning of the language "at any time after the five minutes' debate has taken place upon proposed amendments" is that an amendment must be first debated under the five-minute rule before the House can cut off debate thereon. Hence the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky should be confined to the paragraph under consideration and amendments pending thereto.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no disposition to take issue with the Chair. The Chair construes the rule as applying to each paragraph?

The SPEAKER. To the pending paragraph and pending amendments thereto. The word "section" as used in the rule is applicable of course to a bill; it would not apply to a report like that now under consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. This revision is like an appropriation bill, in which for the purpose of the rule we always treat each paragraph as a section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that where the right of debate is in question, it is best to give a literal construction to the language of the rule. Hence, he would decide that debate cannot be cut off except upon the pending paragraph or section, if objected to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then the motion to limit debate cannot apply to the whole rule under consideration?

The SPEAKER. It would not cover the whole rule. In other words, the Chair, if the point of order is made, will not entertain a motion to cut off debate upon any amendment that might subsequently be offered and be in order, but would limit the motion to amendments pending. This seems to the Chair to be in the direction of intelligent legislation.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Conforming to the ruling of the Chair, I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole upon the pending paragraph (which is clause 7 of Rule XI) and the pending amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. BLACKBURN, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the proposed revision of the rules, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The clause under consideration is clause 7 of Rule XI, upon which, by order of the House, debate is limited to one minute. No amendment is pending, the amendment offered yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] having been withdrawn.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the paragraph as now amended be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To commerce, to the Committee on Commerce; and the Committee on Commerce shall have the same privileges in reporting bills making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors as is accorded to the Committee on Appropriations in reporting general appropriation bills.

Mr. ANDERSON. I move to amend by adding to clause 7 the following:

But the Speaker shall not entertain a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of passing a river and harbor bill until after such bill shall have been considered by items in Committee of the Whole, and the report thereof acted upon by the House.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to amend by adding to the clause as now amended the following:

But the river and harbor bill shall never be passed by suspension of the rules, nor shall any resolution or motion to suspend the rules for this purpose be in order at any time, anything in the rules or practice of this House to the contrary notwithstanding. This clause shall not be suspended, except by unanimous consent.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 43, noes 87.

Mr. COX called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph as amended the following:

Provided, That no motion shall be entertained to pass a river and harbor appropriation bill, or any one of the general appropriation bills, by a suspension of the rules, save by unanimous consent.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move to amend by adding to the clause the following:

Provided, That no river and harbor appropriation bill be passed without having its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REAGAN. I make a point of order on this amendment. We have voted down substantially the same proposition twice.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate the propositions to which he refers as being substantially the same as this?

Mr. REAGAN. I refer to the amendments that immediately preceded this one. Among them, the last one, that offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] was the same as this.

Mr. COX. The other amendments were coupled with another proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to remark that according to his recollection those amendments embraced other propositions. Substantially this proposition was undoubtedly embraced in one of the other propositions, but it never was presented by itself.

The question recurred on Mr. COX's amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 84.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. I propose the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no appropriation bill be passed without having its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REAGAN. That is the same proposition introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania who offered the first amendment.

Mr. COX. That was limited to rivers and harbors.

Mr. KENNA. This has the same effect, and no other.

Mr. CLYMER. My amendment was, "no general appropriation bill."

Mr. COX. Mine is, "no appropriation bill." It includes all money that goes out of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was, "no general appropriation bill."

Mr. REAGAN. The amendment I referred to was made by a gentleman on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. That was coupled with the river and harbor bill. The river and harbor bill is not an appropriation bill under the rules of the House. So this is still a different proposition from the one before presented.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

8. To agriculture: to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "agriculture," in the first part of the line, "and forestry."

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, we have laws regulating tree culture, and there is no committee to which questions relating to tree culture or forestry may be sent as properly as to the Committee on Agriculture. For the last two or three years such questions have been referred to that committee. Formerly they were sent to the Committee on Public Lands. I trust there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think there is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AIKEN. I move to insert after the word "agriculture" the following: "Who shall receive the estimates and report the appropriations for the Agricultural Department."

The CHAIRMAN. The word "agriculture" occurs twice in the clause. After which one does the gentleman propose to insert his amendment?

Mr. AIKEN. After the word "agriculture" where it occurs the second time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point of order that is not in order here, because we have already assigned it to a different committee. The House has already determined otherwise in paragraph 3, to wit, that they should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BROWNE. There was a proposition to amend as to the committees.

Mr. GARFIELD. The point of order is now the question before the committee.

Mr. BROWNE. I am talking about that. I wish to observe there was a proposition to amend the rule by dividing the appropriations among the several committees. That was voted down, and I presume it is competent to offer an amendment as to each particular committee as the clauses are read, the House having voted down the general proposition.

Mr. BLOUNT. It was competent when we were on the subject of appropriations, but we have passed that whole subject, and have assigned it to the Committee on Appropriations; and, therefore, I insist it is not in order at this place. We have passed that whole subject, and come to other matters than this touching appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a fact that previous amendments embracing other things than this have been rejected. But this amendment is not out of order for that reason. It is always in order to amend by proviso modifying something preceding. The point of order is, therefore, overruled.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the gentleman from Georgia should make a point of order on an amendment of that kind, when in the entire discussion of this Rule XI, for the past five or six days, the word agriculture has not been once heard upon this floor.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point of order that the gentleman is discussing only that which has already been decided by the Chair.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not yield to the gentleman from Georgia. We have been told by gentlemen of legislative experience on this floor that if each committee is intrusted with the appropriations which properly belong to it, we may bid adieu to anything like economical administration of affairs. The gentleman who presents these rules has told us that we will thereby increase the budget so largely that the people would be unable to bear it. That is simply an assertion; there is no argument in it. Neither of these gentlemen ever had one minute's experience of such a system. This House has never had any experience of such a system of presenting appropriation bills. To my mind, directly the contrary would be the truth. The majority in the House is responsible for the legislation of this body. Every committee is organized in proportion to that majority; and therefore will be responsible for all matters intrusted to its charge. Why is it that the majority of such a committee is not just as well able to show what is economy on any particular subject intrusted to it as the Committee on Appropriations?

I go further, Mr. Chairman, and say that under the present system of legislation it is practically impossible for the Committee on Appropriations to do justice to all the appropriation bills which come before it. That committee, when they meet, have presented to them a book of estimates—voluntarily given to them, and which no member on the floor can get without applying for it. It does seem to me, and I only speak from their legislation upon this floor, that the first and last effort of the Committee on Appropriations is to report a bill having a few dollars and cents less than is called for in that book of estimates. And they present that as a sure evidence of their economic administration!

Take any one of these standing committees and refer to it every appropriation which by name properly belongs to it, and that committee will investigate the question more closely than can be done by the Appropriations Committee, and even if they do increase the amount, it will be proper and practical legislative economy.

Take, for instance, the Military Committee. What has that committee to do? I do not know. I have never heard of any report, that I can recall, from the Military Committee, except one to reduce the Army. And yet we have a Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and a Committee on Appropriations that tells you how much money shall be appropriated for the War Department. I ask this House, is not that Military Committee, with a majority of men who are looking to an honest, faithful, and economical administration of affairs, just as able to do the entire duty of that branch of legislation which these different committees have to do as that Committee on Appropriations?

When we go through the entire list of the committees, we will after a while come down to an appropriation made for the Agricultural Department. And who knows, Mr. Chairman, how large this should be?

I venture here the assertion without having ever made an investigation, that the Committee on Appropriations have never gone into the Agricultural Department to see whether it was deserving of one dollar or not. I will go further, and say without having made any investigation, that the Committee on Appropriations have never sent a sub-committee to make such an investigation.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, I will venture a little further, and say there are members of the Committee on Appropriations who have never been inside of the Agricultural Department.

A MEMBER. Name them.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know them. I should like to have them rise up and say whether they have been there. I question it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What is the question of the gentleman from South Carolina? What does he say in reference to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. AIKEN. I am saying that I question whether you or some members of the Committee on Appropriations have ever been inside of the Agricultural Department to see whether it deserved any money or not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. As far as I am individually concerned——

Mr. AIKEN. Then my allusion does not apply to the gentleman from Kentucky, who presents these rules. I excuse him. [Laughter.]

I ask simple justice to the Agricultural Department. Some members of the Committee on Agriculture have gone through that Department, and they know what it wants and what it is entitled to, and that it asks for nothing that is not right and proper. That is all.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I would like to correct one statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina, and that is that the Appropriations Committee in the first session of the Forty-fifth Congress did go into the Agricultural Department, and made a very thorough examination of it.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend from South Carolina whenever he takes the floor turns himself loose without any restraint in bold assertion.

In the first place, he announces to this House that nobody has the Book of Estimates except the Committee on Appropriations. The gentleman has been here for some time, and ought to have learned, if he has not, that if he sent to the document-room he could procure a copy of the Book of Estimates as well as any member of the Committee on Appropriations or any member upon this floor. Any gentleman on this floor may send to the document-room and get a copy of that book.

Mr. AIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? I made half a dozen efforts to get that book and never did get it until I went to the Agricultural Department, and they gave me one.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then the gentleman's position is an exceptional one. I find it in the hands of many members here.

Then the gentleman undertakes to say that we of the Committee on Appropriations have never been to the Agricultural Department. Now, it does seem to me the gentleman ought not to put us in the attitude of getting up here to satisfy him whether that statement is true or not.

I undertake to say, sir, so far as that Department is concerned, it has been fully investigated time and again. In reference to the receipts and expenditures of the Agricultural Department there always is careful examination made, and time and again the officers of that Department who are supposed to be well informed in relation to it have been called before our committee on subjects pertaining to their duties.

Now, without undertaking to discuss the question as to where these bills shall go, I have simply risen to do the Committee on Appropriations justice against the loose statements made by the gentleman from South Carolina on this and other occasions.

Mr. FINLEY. I offer this amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Department" add the words "to the House for reference to the Committee on Appropriations."

Mr. LORING. I am perfectly aware, Mr. Chairman, of the feeling and sentiment which animate the committee with regard to the reference of all appropriations to the Committee on Appropriations. That must be apparent to every member here present, and I desire in no way to antagonize that feeling by anything that I may say with regard to the Committee on Agriculture.

It may be entirely proper for those committees whose business has been long established in this country and by the machinery of this House to be in the attitude they are placed in reference to the Committee on Appropriations. I do not at this stage of the proceedings object one particle to that. I desire to say to the committee, however, that the business placed in the hands of the Committee on Agriculture is so unformed that it is impossible for the Appropriations Committee to estimate in any way what are the demands of the Department. The Department is a new one. It is a new addition to the machinery of this Government, not yet developed and not yet complete, and holding in its hands, as every man on this floor knows, the most important industry of the American people.

Now, sir, considering this fact, it seems to me it must be apparent to every gentleman on this floor that all the wants and necessities of that Department which will not only sustain it in its present condition, but which will develop it to that point which is desired and demanded by the American people, should be in the hands of some committee that can estimate them. All the variety of subjects which it covers should be properly and definitely specified by the committee, and when the Committee on Agriculture recommends an appropriation, as proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, it seems to me that recommendation should contain such specified points as to appeal at once to the good sense of the people, and, more than all, that this Department should be elevated into that position which is held by every department of a similar nature in every government on the face of the earth except our own.

I am waiting patiently, sir, to see the Department of Agriculture take the stand which it ought to take here. I do not care how it is done, whether it is done by elevating the Commissioner to a Cabinet position or not; but I do desire that the Department should be so conducted in some way as to appeal to the good sense and the justice of those who know what this department of industry is.

It seems to me this should be made an exception. While the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Military Affairs, by long precedent and established usage, know what their duties are, and while the Appropriations Committee know almost by instinct what their obligations are to those two great branches of the Government, it does appear to me the House and the Appropriations Committee should be willing to learn by careful investigation of the committee which has in charge this industry what are the specific wants of the Department of Agriculture.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I would like to say on this subject that the salaries in the Department of Agriculture, from the Commissioner down, are provided for by law, to which the Committee on Appropriations conform in framing the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The appropriations for seed and for the distribution of seed, and the expenses therewith connected, go into another bill, the sundry civil. There is not much discretion, indeed, in reference to these two items. The one is regulated by law; the other is regulated by the disposition of Congress as to the amount, and it is open to the whole House to offer amendments. It seems to me that after the other proposition has been voted down it is hardly worth while to make this an exception.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I indorse every word that the gentleman from Massachusetts has so well said——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind the gentleman that there are only three minutes of the time remaining.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not want longer than that. I indorse every word the gentleman from Massachusetts has said in reference to the importance of the Committee on Agriculture to which are committed the interests of the Department of Agriculture. But I do not see what good is to result from the discussion that must necessarily ensue upon the propositions to take these bills one by one, after the House in Committee of the Whole has voted down the general proposition to distribute them. I will not go back to reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN,] because he was mistaken in almost everything he said. For myself I never opposed the distribution of these bills. I was quite willing to take the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER,] and said to the House if they desired to distribute these bills they should distribute all the bills except the legislative and the sundry civil appropriation bills.

But, sir, let me say in regard to the Committee on Appropriations it would almost appear that that committee has no duty in the world but one, and that is to sit here patiently on the floor with its mouth closed and listen uncomplainingly to all the criticisms and abuse anybody sees fit to heap upon it, although he may not know anything about its work or its business.

But I am willing now to go back and take away all the appropriation bills except the sundry civil and the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bills from the Committee on Appropriations, and would agree to give them up if anybody claimed or wanted them, and give them to their respective committees provided you give me any check or limitation upon that road which is thereby opened to every committee to ride into the public Treasury. I am perfectly willing to give to the Committee on Agriculture what is here claimed, but if you are going to do that you had better tear down the faulty system you have now, tear it to the earth, and build it up anew. You cannot make a satisfactory piece of patchwork out of what you have got in existence now.

The question being taken on Mr. FINLEY'S amendment to the amendment of Mr. AIKEN, it was not agreed to.

The question being taken on Mr. AIKEN'S amendment, there were—ayes 74, noes 62.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 45 members voting therefor.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 64.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I give notice that I will call for the yeas and nays on this amendment in the House.

The Clerk resumed the reading of Rule XI, and read the following clauses:

9. To the relations of the United States with foreign nations: to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

10. To the military establishment and the public defense, other than the appropriations for its support: to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BROWNE. I move to amend by striking out the words in clause 10, "other than the appropriations for its support."

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point of order that this same amendment, or one equivalent thereto, has already been acted upon by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment heretofore offered was one embracing various committees and giving them the specific right to report appropriation bills. This is not such an amendment. It simply relates to the Committee on Military Affairs, and does not attempt to give it the initiative of appropriation bills, that right being given to the Committee on Appropriations by another clause of the rule. This merely proposes to strike out certain words from clause 10. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

Mr. BROWNE. The vote of the committee a few moments ago destroys the symmetry of this colossal system of appropriations. I congratulate the committee on the fact that a small measure, at least, of justice was done the Committee on Agriculture. I hope it will be as manifest that the duty of making provision for the support of the Army belongs to the Military Committee as it was that to appropriate a few thousands of dollars for the purpose of purchasing seeds and distributing them among the various congressional districts should be committed to the Committee on Agriculture.

Now, I believe that we ought to break down by piecemeal what we have not been able to accomplish by wholesale. The committee having shown that it is in the humor to do this work by the vote which has just been taken, I hope it will continue the work until we accomplish this reform.

Mr. SIMONTON. The question of the distribution of the powers of the Appropriations Committee is one that has engaged the attention of this Committee of the Whole for some time. A great many reasons have been offered why such distributions should be made. Among others, it has been gravely argued on this floor that if the duties and powers of that committee were divided among other committees, then gentlemen would have a better opportunity to put themselves forward in this House. I have no doubt that would be true.

We have been told that if there was a distribution of the powers and duties of the Appropriations Committee there would not be any increase of the expenditures of the Government. I would ask gentlemen, how do you know that the Agricultural Committee will not bring in a larger appropriation for that Department than would the Appropriations Committee? I would ask this question: if gentlemen do not want more money for the particular Departments to which their committees relate, then why are they dissatisfied with the action of the Appropriations Committee? If it is not in order that they may obtain more money, why then do they want the powers of the Appropriations Committee distributed among the other committees of this House? Why must the Committee on Agriculture say what amounts shall be appropriated for the Department of Agriculture; or the Committee on Military Affairs say what amount shall be appropriated for the maintenance and support of the Army? Is it not because members are not satisfied with the amounts given by the Appropriations Committee? Now, if the Appropriations Committee should give too much, gentlemen can very easily move amendments to cut down the amount proposed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. They never move to cut down.

Mr. SIMONTON. I have never known an amendment offered to cut down the amount proposed. The truth is the difficulty with gentlemen arises from the fact that the Appropriations Committee does not give the Departments to which their committees relate enough of the public money; that is the difficulty.

It seems to be evident that if each of these committees is clothed with the power to originate appropriation bills, then the aggregate appropriations for the support of the Government will be enlarged. That must be the reason, unless it be that the distribution is desired for the other purpose which has been indicated; that is, that gentlemen belonging to the other committees may have an opportunity to put themselves forward on this floor.

Now, sir, I have the ambition which is common to every man here, not only to discharge my duties well and to the best of my ability, but I desire in discharging those duties to do so in such manner that I may have full credit for so doing and receive the approval and applause of my constituents. But I must remember that I was not sent here to serve myself but to promote the best interests of my constituents. If in discharging my duty here I shall pursue a course which must lead to an increase of public expenditures, I certainly shall not thereby promote the interests of my constituents.

I think this is a question which we should gravely consider. The Committee of the Whole has already said that in the aggregate the question of distributing the powers to the Appropriations Committee is not one which should be adopted. Yet it seems we are about to adopt it in detail.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would inquire what is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In clause 10, of Rule XI, strike out the words "other than the appropriation for its support;" so that the clause, if amended, will read as follows:

"10. To the military establishment and the public defense: to the Committee on Military Affairs."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE,] for the purpose of calling the attention of the Committee of the Whole House to the effect of that amendment. The amendment means simply the giving to the Committee on Military Affairs, as the Committee of the Whole has just determined to give to the Committee on Agriculture, the preparation and reporting of the appropriation bill for the maintenance and support of the military establishment of the country.

Now, sir, when the Committee of the Whole the other day determined that the Committee on Commerce should have the absolute custody of the appropriation bill known as the river and harbor bill, I was at a loss to see what reason could be assigned for keeping the rest of the appropriation bills in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations.

If the amendment now pending shall be adopted, the Committee of the Whole having just taken the agricultural appropriation bill and sent it to the Committee on Agriculture, I cannot for the life of me see why the same rule should not be logically applied all through this Rule XI, and why these general appropriation bills should not be remitted to their own respective committees.

I say again, as I have already said, that I believe it would be the part of prudence and of wisdom—and I trust to time to demonstrate the wisdom of my suggestion—to put some limitations upon this right which will be given to these several committees to draw upon the public Treasury at their pleasure. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SIMONTON,] who has just taken his seat, has well said that the history of Congress furnishes no instance in which any committee, which it is proposed to clothe with this additional power of making appropriations, ever moved to reduce an appropriation bill that came here from the Committee on Appropriations. They are constantly moving to increase the appropriation, but never once moving to reduce it, when the appropriation for the Department in their charge is reached.

Now, I think it but fair, since the Committee of the Whole has given to the Committee on Commerce the custody of the river and harbor appropriation bill, and since it has also given to the Committee on Agriculture the agricultural appropriation bill——

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) There is no agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is no agricultural appropriation bill so called, but appropriations are annually made for the maintenance of the agricultural bureau. In that case, I think it logical that these several appropriation bills shall be taken away from the Committee on Appropriations; distributed to the several committees of this House, after the fashion of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER.] And if it shall be so determined, then I think this House had best put some sort of limitation or check upon what will then be the unlimited, dangerous, and fatal power scattered among eleven different committees to take out of the public Treasury any amount of money they may choose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, we have reached a point where I know that the difference of judgment among men here is very wide; where all that any one man can do is to state his own judgment. I never saw any proposition clearer in my own mind than I do this: that if we follow out what we have begun, as applied to the Committee on Agriculture, we will commit an enormous blunder in the management of public affairs; a blunder that very few of us will fail to see in the fullest and strongest light when we have once had a fair opportunity to witness its operations. Now, that is only an opinion. There are plenty of men here who are, perhaps, clearer-minded than I am, who may not agree with me in that opinion.

I want, however, to say now to the Committee of the Whole in this connection, that in my judgment we have reached a condition of things where there is but one remedy for the hobble in which we find ourselves. It is this: to strip the Committee of Appropriations of the power proposed to be given it under the twenty-first rule, to legislate on appropriation bills, leave it only the work of recommending appropriations strictly according to the law, and let the other committees of this House have the sole right of proposing for the action of the House such legislation as they may deem necessary. Let the Committee on Military Affairs report the legislation for the Army; the Committee on Naval Affairs the legislation for the Navy; the Committee on Agriculture the legislation in the interest of agriculture. Let the Committee on Appropriations be the servant of the House—its auditing committee, to find what is the law, and to report such appropriations according to law as the Treasury can stand. If we remit these various committees strictly and rigidly to their appropriate business, the opposition that we find springing up on all hands against the Committee on Appropriations will, in my judgment, largely and at once disappear.

Now, I do not hesitate to say for myself (and I speak for only one man) that if this distribution of the business of the Committee on Appropriations shall be adopted, I shall vote against these rules—all of them—as my only mode of voting against what I believe to be an enormons blunder.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is right.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should be very sorry to vote against these rules, for I believe that a service of very great value has been done by the codification of this committee. But if what I deem so great a mistake shall find its way into these rules and be fixed as a part of them, so that we cannot get rid of it, then I shall be compelled to vote against the whole. But I trust that gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber will come to the work of rescuing us from the loss of the rules, and from the calamity that threatens us.

In regard to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Commerce, I do not now discuss that question. That has been disposed of; and it is a matter partly fixed by tradition and custom as well as by rule. But I speak of the remaining regular appropriation bills; for the river and harbor bill was never one of the regular appropriation bills.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. After a long discussion and upon full deliberation the Committee of the Whole a day or two since determined by a majority of some 40 votes——

A MEMBER. Eighteen.

Mr. FRYE. By a majority of 18 votes, decided against dividing the present work of the Appropriations Committee. Does the gentleman suppose that this Committee of the Whole will now proceed to do seriatim on these different propositions what they have already deliberately refused to do?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do. They have given a sign to-day that that is the purpose.

Mr. FRYE. The agricultural sign, which always carries the House.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] gives us a sign that the third clause of the twenty-first rule is to be amended.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer that as the escape from this difficulty.

Mr. REED. It is the only escape.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am helping the Speaker of the House with all my power to prevent this division; and I shall help him, whatever the result. But I say now that in my judgment the only safe, certain, and complete help is to remove the cause of the difficulty.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] withdraws his pro forma amendment, and I renew it. I wish, Mr. Chairman, to express my surprise at the style of argument indulged in by the gentleman from Kentucky. He confesses his inability to see why, if the House refuses to take from the Committee on Commerce and to give to the Committee on Appropriations the control of the river and harbor bill, which it never did control, the House ought not therefore to distribute all the other appropriations among the other committees. He tells us that he sees no difference. How often has it been explained, how fully has this House understood it, except the gentleman from Kentucky, that the proposition to put this bill under the control of the Committee on Appropriations was inspired by the enemies of this character of appropriations, was intended to prevent such appropriations, and that it would be a physical impossibility for that committee to deal with this question, because experience has shown that the preparation of such a bill requires three or four months of incessant labor, day after day? Many members voted no doubt (and with me it was a controlling reason) against sending the bill there, where it never had been, because it was a physical impossibility for that committee to deal with the question, and because it was believed that this was a character of appropriations which ought to be made, which were beneficent in their operation upon the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman who is conducting this discussion on the part of the Committee on Rules that he ought not to get in a pet, and because the House has done a reasonable and necessary and just thing declare that he will do everything else wrong.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to any amendment made by the gentleman from Texas, [laughter;] and if I may be as liberal in advice, unasked, as he assumed to be, I will not counsel him not to "get in a pet," but I would suggest to him not to be unreasonable in his game of grabbing. After he has gotten possession for his committee of something which it seems to me never belonged there, I do not think it fair for him to turn upon other men who, in similar positions, are seeking to gain like advantages, and complain of them.

I did sincerely trust that the gentleman from Texas had gotten through discussing the Commerce Committee and its rights and duties. We have now before us a proposition offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE,] and I ask the Committee of the Whole to listen to just one suggestion upon that subject. It is proposed to take from the control of the Committee on Appropriations what is known as the Army appropriation bill. If that be done, I take it for granted the House will distribute all the appropriation bills among the various committees. If that be in the interest of economy I am mistaken. I know, sir, that in the last Congress the Committee on Appropriations reported to this House a bill known as the Post-Office appropriation bill, which, upon a motion emanating from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, was increased in the aggregate to the extent of $1,000,000, in round numbers. I know that it is a matter of history, as the records of Congress will show, that there has never been an instance in which each committee, as its separate department was reached, has not endeavored, in every method and by every means possible, to increase the appropriation bills.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I take issue with the gentleman.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know very well it is proper and right that each Department of the Government should have its own especial friends upon this floor. The Committee on Naval Affairs is selected by the Speaker with the view of getting together men who are friendly to that Department. So with the Committee on Military Affairs; and it is the same way all through the list of committees. They are appointed that they may see to a change of the law wherever it be necessary to guard the interests of the particular Department committed to their care. That is the theory of the construction of the committees of this House; and it is a proper theory.

The Committee on Appropriations stands in a very different attitude. Bearing no special relation to any Department, selected as a fair and impartial arbiter, with no more concern for the Navy or the Army than for the Interior Department or the Post-Office Department, it has been selected as the one grand reservoir into which all these proposed disbursements of money should pour, in order that fairly, judicially, impartially it may make its recommendations to this House. Now, if you mean to take these bills from that committee—and the Committee of the Whole seem so determined—if the amendment now pending be adopted, I enter a solemn protest against it, not in the interest of party, but in the interest of economic and fair administration.

But I go further and remind the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] my colleague on the Committee on Rules, that we are not yet reduced to the dire alternative which he describes. We are not yet forced to extricate ourselves from this threatened dilemma by adopting his suggested amendment and striking off the only limitation that the rule now puts upon the increase of appropriations by amendment after an appropriation bill comes into the House. He says that the alternative suggested by him is the only escape. I remind him that he has spoken hastily. There is another escape, and I trust that it will be embraced. If this proposition for the distribution of the appropriation bills shall be adopted without limitation, and then if the only safeguard that we hold to-day under the rule upon the people's Treasury is to be stricken down, I sincerely, honestly, and earnestly trust that the report made by the Committee on Rules in the shape of a revision, so mangled and marred, with all its sins, if it has any, and with whatever good may belong to it, may be rejected and spewed out of the mouth of this House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITTHORNE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] offered a pro forma amendment which will be regarded as withdrawn if there be no objection.

Objection was made.

The question being taken on the pro forma amendment of Mr. REAGAN, it was not agreed to.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the pending amendment by striking out the last two words. The committee will bear me witness that at the outset of the discussion upon these rules I announced my approval of the work of the committee, and I further announced that I was opposed to the proposed distribution of the work of appropriations among the several committees of the House. If, however, the judgment of the House is different as to one committee, I shall feel it my duty, on behalf of the committee of which I am chairman, to make the motion that the appropriations relating to the Navy shall be assigned to that committee.

Just a word to my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.] He brags too much on his hand. His hand does not justify it. [Laughter.] I undertake to say that upon opportunity being furnished to me I will demonstrate that most of the vicious legislation of the last eight or ten years has originated with the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAWLEY. It was certainly so last summer.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Further, I take issue with the gentleman from Kentucky when he says that there is no committee of this House that has not urged the increase of expenditures rather than their diminution. I speak now for the committee of which I was chairman in the Forty-fourth Congress. Two of my colleagues on that committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] and the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS,] are now here; and I undertake to say in their presence and in the presence of the record that the Committee on Naval Affairs did recommend material reductions, looking toward a decrease in the number of officers of the Navy and in their pay, looking to a decrease of the navy-yard establishments of the country and a decrease of the Marine Corps. They were not sustained by the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentlemen allow me a question?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. In a moment. I see near me the distinguished Speaker of this House, who in that Congress was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I appeal to him to say whether as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs I did not come to him and tell him that the appropriations for naval purposes could be brought down to $12,000,000, or thereabout, and whether he did not, in accordance with that suggestion and upon mutual counsel between us, report a bill reducing the expenditures of the Navy Department to $12,616,000. We co-operated at that time. My friend from Kentucky is not justified in his assertion. When he looks to the record he will find that our committee at no time since I have been chairman of it has recommended an increase of expenditures. We have looked to economy in the expenditures of the Government; we have looked to retrenchment wherever possible. To be sure we have not in all cases received the support of the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman allow me now to ask a question?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman undertake to tell this House how often in the last and the preceding Congress I have seen him stand here as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and offer amendment after amendment to the naval appropriation bills as reported by the Committee on Appropriations, each amendment providing for an increase of expenditure?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The gentleman never saw me do that but once; and that was when, in view of the removal of the Navy Department from the old building to the new one, I proposed the employment of an additional clerk. That is all he ever saw me do in the way of increasing naval expenditures. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe in the theory of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I believe that there ought to be one committee in charge of the appropriations of the Government, a single head having the unloosening of the purse-strings of the country. But I also believe that that committee should be confined to the law as it is and to their appropriate duties under the law, [applause;] they should not usurp the jurisdiction, the judgment, the work that properly belongs to the other committees of the House.

Hence, sir, I have been here supporting the work of the committee. If you will turn to my original remarks, you will see I indicated that I would limit the work of the Committee on Appropriations to the law, purely and abstractly, to the item of reduction of salary and kindred subjects.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the House that if it will go on in the work of distribution of the subject-matters to the various committees—I appeal to the House on the score of economy, looking back to the record of the Naval Committee, that the work of naval appropriations shall likewise be distributed to that committee.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Mr. Chairman, I think it due to the gentleman from Tennessee I should state that in the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress I had his thorough co-operation in every particular in reducing the expenditures of the naval establishment for the then following fiscal year; and I am glad to hear him say that he believes in having a single head in connection with these appropriation bills.

I wish for myself there could be less feeling and more deliberation in the discussion of these questions. If we would not become excited we could act more intelligently.

The House to-day has acted in reference to the appropriations for the Agricultural Department in a manner which I think upon reflection they will regret. For it will be observed that the appropriations for that Department are included in two bills, which nobody on this floor has suggested to be taken away from the Committee on Appropriations, to wit, the salaries for employés of that establishment as I have already stated are provided for in the executive, legislative, and judicial appropriation bill, while the appropriations for seeds and for their distribution are provided for in the sundry civil bill. It was, and I say it with the greatest respect, an act which I think not fully considered when the House so decided. But because the House so acted is not any reason why we should rush forward to distribute all these appropriation bills as proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky who has charge of these rules.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not proposing anything of the sort. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I understood the gentleman to say that if the appropriations in reference to the Agricultural Department and the appropriations in reference to improvements of rivers and harbors were to be distributed to the Committee on Agriculture and to the Committee on Commerce, then we might as well go on and distribute all the others to the several committees having charge of the various subjects in this House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I said that was the logical conclusion as to what the House meant to do.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I do not look at it in that light. I think the case of the Committee on Commerce is different from that of any other, and I hope the House, as the gentleman from Kentucky has given notice he will call for a separate vote in the House upon the amendment adopted in the committee, will reverse the action of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in reference to the distribution to the Committee on Agriculture of the appropriations for carrying on that Department of the Government.

Nor can it be believed anywhere that in reversing that action there will be on the part of the House any hostility to the interests of agriculture. If it is desired, as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING,] to make the Commissioner of Agriculture a Cabinet minister, that can be done by independent and separate legislation.

While I am upon the floor I should like to say a word or two in connection with a suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that because these bills may be distributed then we ought to strike out the power of the Committee on Appropriations to introduce anything as legislation upon an appropriation bill. I remember very well the origin of that clause of the rule. A gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Holman, a member of the Forty-fourth Congress, brought that proposition here, and, after full discussion, it was adopted. It was through the agency of that provision of the rules that all the reductions which could be made at that Congress, whether great or little, were accomplished. The principle and policy of that amendment were these, that whenever by legislation the people's expenditures were to be increased, it should be done by separate bill; but whenever the Congress of the United States could in any manner decrease the expenditures of the Government, there should be a swift way provided for cutting off such extravagant or unnecessary expenditures. That is the rock upon which the representatives of the democratic party on this floor placed their party; it is the rock upon which it has stood ever since; and I hope, sir, it is the rock which will finally bring it into possession of every department of this Government from the Executive down. [Applause on the democratic side of the House.]

Therefore I say deliberately to the gentleman from Ohio, as one member of the House, that I shall resist in every possible way known to the rules, and that I shall use every argument and persuasion which my intellect will enable me to use upon the members of this House not to fall into the error of taking from the representatives of the people the power at any time to decrease the expenditures of this Government, and thereby lighten the taxation imposed upon the people. And can you of that side stand fairly or justly in any attitude of opposition to such a measure?

There has been complaint, Mr. Chairman, and I wish I could see the way to remedy it, and draw a line of distinction between what might be called economical expenditures of the Government and those amendments to the appropriation bills which have political purposes in view. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio that he can never have the indorsement of the people of this country in striking down a barrier the object and purpose of which have been to prevent extravagance in the expenditures of the Government and secure economical administration. There may be a show of approbation before the people by seeking to strike down the power to reduce expenditures, because that power has been used to place upon appropriation bills amendments to legislation of a political character. But let us be sincere here with each other at least, and let us join hands in legitimately reducing as far as we can the expenses of administration. Let us in separate and open statutes provide legislation in reference to political questions, permitting it to come from other committees, which the majority on one side or the other may deem absolutely essential to the preservation of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the advice the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania gives us to keep cool is one we will all follow I am sure to the full extent of his bright example on that subject. And I wish to say at the very outset that in so far as the rule known as the last clause of the twenty-first rule is directed to aiding real actual economy in the expenditures of this Government it always has had and has now my most cordial support. I know the distinguished gentleman himself in advocating it originally meant that and that only; and his meaning was approved of by the people of this country, approved by men on both sides of this Chamber. But he will remember I pointed out at that moment that the language of the clause went far beyond the mere economies of the revenues. It did not say merely that reduction of salaries should be in order. If it had said that I would agree to it. It did not say it would be always in order to reduce the amount in an estimate or an appropriation. If it had said that I should agree to it. That can be put into the rules and maintained. But the language was that anything that tended toward economy——

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is not in the rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. I say that is in the rules in effect.

Mr. SPRINGER. No; the language is "shall retrench expenditures."

Mr. GARFIELD. But the construction of the rule has been that if in the judgment of the Chair—the man who happens to preside—the proposition shall tend toward the retrenchment of expenditures, then it shall be in order. In what direction have we not drifted under that latitudinarian construction? Every conceivable scheme of partisan legislation that has torn this House with passion, that has lashed the party tiger into rage, that has converted us, not into a deliberative body, but into a political caucus; all these Trojan horses, all these evils, all these political volcanoes which have burst in American politics for the last three years in this Chamber have done so through the crater of that rule as construed by the presiding officers of this House. [Applause on the republican side.] And to stop that volcano, to reduce this House to business, to bring it back to the deliberation that ought to belong to it, that we may be, as the Speaker advises, calm, that we may come down to the manly work of carrying on our Government in economy and under law, is my most earnest wish.

And for that reason we are not so poor and so utterly bankrupt of expedients that we cannot frame a rule which shall meet all my friend's wishes and avoid all that the best men of both sides of this House deprecate and desire to get rid of; that shall shut out the everlasting tiger of politics from this arena, and let the Appropriations Committee be the great auditing committee of the House to do their work under law, and let the rest of us in our several committee duties do the legislation for the House.

If we do that, gentlemen, we will not be put into an attitude of fighting economy. We cannot by any torture of language be said to be fighting economy when we take the position I assume to-day; and I do not take this position as a partisan. I take it because I want to see the party to which I belong stand on it, not only in the minority, but stand on it when they come into the majority.

The gentleman said that was the rock on which the democratic party was saved. It is the rock on which the democratic party is splitting, breaking; it is a rule which will break any party that would follow it to the extent of converting this body into a mere political debating society. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, one would suppose from the language of the gentleman from Ohio that this mode of legislation upon appropriation bills had its origin in a democratic House. When the democratic party came into the control of the House of Representatives there was found among the rules a power to legislate upon appropriation bills, under a construction of former Speakers, which might increase appropriations, but could not retrench expenditures. We simply changed that rule as construed by former Speakers, reversing the construction, so that in effect all legislation put on appropriation bills should retrench expenditures, making the language absolute.

I very well remember in a discussion at the close of the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress I alluded to the fact that those who had gone before us, when the majority sat upon that side, had given us an example in this respect. I cited instances, and among them I may enumerate that they embraced changes in the line and staff of the Army and Navy, increasing both; that they included the Pacific mail subsidy which subsequently brought upon Congress so much adverse criticism. They included also, with increase of expenditure, the reorganization of the Post-Office Department. They included the reorganization of the consular and diplomatic service, with increased expenditure. They included the reorganization of the civil service of the Treasury Department. There are many others to which I might allude, showing that the action of the party now dominant here, when they first came into control of this House, did not change as to legislation on appropriation bills per se. It merely said that whenever legislation was put on appropriation bills it should be in the direction of saving money to the people of the country; it should be in the direction of economical expenditure. And under that change of rule there were $30,000,000 saved at that session in the amount of the appropriations as compared with the previous year.

There is where we should want to stand. There is where there should be no political division; and to that end I am glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio say that in so far as strict economy is concerned, outside of political questions, any change of rule which would prevent such proceeding will not receive his support.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, this is a question which is before us upon the organization of the method of doing the business of the House; and I must say that for one I am sorry that party matters have been brought here. I believe there is a plain system upon which we can manage these matters and avoid not only the rock upon which the democratic party has split, but also avoid the difficulties of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has given us the details, in years before the democratic party came into power in this House.

Both parties have been taught lessons which ought to show us that it is unsafe to have a system of legislation which is founded upon loading down the appropriation bills. Whether it is done upon pretense of economy or upon a pretense of appropriating for the proper needs of the Government, it is equally wrong. But if we frame a rule—and surely we are capable of doing that—which says that the Appropriations Committee shall make no appropriations except those which are according to law, then that provision obliges all other committees to attend to matters of legislation. And I say that the scenes we have witnessed in this House ever since this discussion of rules began has been on account of the provision which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] wants to strike out. It is not in human nature as represented upon the Appropriations Committee not to present new legislation under that clause; and when we happen to have, as we did have in the last Congress, a gentleman on that committee who knew everything, we had a perfect avalanche of such business brought before us; and it is equally impossible with human nature as it is constituted outside of the Appropriations Committee to prevent gentlemen from exalting their committees just as gentlemen of the Committee on Agriculture have exalted that committee to-day. But if we say that appropriations are to be made according to law by one committee, then we have control of the great general appropriations of the Government, and we know what we can appropriate, and then the other committees can carve out of what is left.

That is a true system, a system that is right and proper, and that enables every committee and every member to participate in the legislation of this House. I sincerely hope we may come up to the level of this question, for I believe it to be a great one, and that we will not degrade it by the introduction of partisan matters. I trust that we shall adopt a system that we shall be satisfied with, a system which we see ourselves must work well, for if we adopt it the Appropriations Committee cannot put a single word of legislation upon an appropriation bill except by unanimous consent; and what more can other committees desire? We then have got a system that is philosophically correct and practically correct.

Mr. COX. I was sorry to hear my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] rather go back upon an expression which he made use of at the beginning of this debate. I understood him to say that however these rules might be amended, if at least they were not substantially obliterated he should endeavor if possible to preserve them; that they were so valuable as a digest, as a codification, that, although they might be amended here and there in some particulars, he desired to save them as a code.

Our present rules are almost like chaos, without form, and therefore very often void. Here we have them in good shape. And although the Committee on Commerce may be now content, I think they ought to go further and be willing to carry this even beyond the Agriculture Committee. What reason is there if the Committee on Commerce should take rivers and harbors, and if the Committee on Agriculture should take the appropriation for agricultural purposes—what reason is there why the Committee on Foreign Affairs should not report the diplomatic and consular bill?

We have communications with the State Department. We have letters as to the need of consuls, of clerks, of interpreters, of rents. All the business connected with diplomacy comes before that committee. And although, as I said here before, I would not claim for our committee the making of an appropriation bill, believing that duty should be intrusted to a general committee which will look over the whole subject of the expenditures of the Government, yet the same reason obtains in the one case as in the other. And if the House is determined to go on in that line I shall offer an amendment that the Foreign Affairs Committee shall take charge of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. BAKER. That amendment is too late. We have passed the clause where that could be moved.

Mr. COX. We can arrange that before we get through. If necessary we can add another rule if the House chooses.

This debate has become somewhat irrelevant. It has gone beyond what I expected. My distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has undertaken to denounce again, as he denounced when we adopted it, Rule 120 as reported by the Committee on Rules, after being sent to it on the motion of Judge Holman. I have said to this House, and it has been proved heretofore in debate here, that but for Rule 120 there would have been no substantial economy in the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses.

The gentleman from Ohio said that our Speaker had interpreted that rule as including all propositions that tended to retrenchment of expenditure. Now, sir, that is not the language of the rule. The language is:

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

And Mr. Speaker Kerr and the distinguished Speaker of this House always have held that they would look at the bill prima facie; that if on its face it showed retrenchment, then the proposition was in order; but if on the other hand it showed extravagance or an enlargement of expenditure, then it would be ruled out of order.

I have never in this House favored riders on appropriation bills. Gentlemen have raked up that old question again. I know that both parties in this House have piled up Pelion on Ossa in the way of legislative provisions on appropriation bills. I have opposed that system on the ground of the philosophy of legislation. I opposed it at the extra session, and I oppose it yet, as unfair, unjust, unscientific legislation.

But I remember that it began with the republicans, and the republican kettle cannot call the democratic pot black on that subject. You are all in the same boat. You actually carried the proposition to confer suffrage on the negroes in the District of Columbia on an appropriation bill. You remodeled the Supreme Court of the United States, you packed it, by a rider on an appropriation bill; and I do not know but you afterward abolished colored suffrage in the District of Columbia in the same abnormal manner.

But that is beyond the question. Let some one bring in a rule of this House that will conform to the very best science connected with our progress in legislation, and I think there would be a large majority in this House to sustain such a proposition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY. It seems to be conceded unanimously, or if not quite so now, yet likely soon to be, that the twenty-first rule contains, somehow or other, in its words or in its interpretation, a grave error resulting in great injury to the country. Our distinguished Speaker has himself more than intimated that he is sorry that there has been this sort of political legislation on appropriation bills. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] very strongly intimated an opinion in the same direction. And the eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] admits that he has been always and unanimously of the same opinion, although he has voted continually for just such legislation.

Mr. COX. Oh, no.

Mr. HAWLEY. I believe the gentleman voted for everything in the shape of political legislation that his party put forward in appropriation bills last session.

Mr. COX. You are mistaken.

Mr. HAWLEY. If you did not vote for it, did you pair off?

Mr. COX. No, I did not.

Mr. HAWLEY. Was the gentleman in favor of the political legislation on appropriation bills which was proposed by his party last summer?

Mr. COX. I will refer you, privately and confidentially, to the RECORD.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is the character of the reference always made by gentlemen who say they oppose this legislation.

Mr. COX. I do not want so good a man as you to fall into a mistake.

Mr. HAWLEY. The reference made by gentlemen on that side of the House is always like that just made by the gentleman from New York, very confidential and private, as to their opposition to such legislation; but when they come to vote they uniformly vote for political legislation on appropriation bills.

But I arose more particularly to point with pleasure to the confession of three distinguished gentlemen on that side of the House, that this Rule XXI is capable of a great mischief. It is capable of a great mischief—not the one which they have indicated, but one which is likely to bring about the complete destruction of the Appropriations Committee, and every one on that side concedes that that would be a great calamity.

I have always believed in legislation by party and by partisan methods; I believe in that yet. But a party must act with some unity or combination of its powers—must put the throttle in the hands of some one committee. I speak of that now as a general principle, and not in reference to any of the details of this controversy. I desire to call the attention of my republican friends to the blunders which they are committing here. It is admitted that the twenty-first rule is a mistake under its present construction. Yet it is proposed here that we shall take the Appropriations Committee, which can now put political legislation on appropriation bills, and make ten committees of the one. The consequence will be that there will be about one hundred and twenty members of this House who, through their committees, will have the right to put political legislation on appropriation bills. The Committee on Commerce, the Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Military Affairs, every one of these committees will have the power which has heretofore been exercised by the Appropriations Committee alone. That is what you are doing.

Are you to take it for granted that the members of the Committee on Agriculture, the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, the members of the other committees, will agree to strike out the last clause of the twenty-first rule, and provide that there shall be no legislation on appropriation bills? I doubt whether they will agree to that, although three of their leaders have to-day indicated that the combination of appropriations with political legislation is not right. I believe they will unanimously stand by that vicious rule; and we are going to throw into the hands of ten democratic committees the power of legislating in appropriation bills. That is what we on this side are doing. There is yet time for the House to pause. We have committed the blunder as to two committees, in regard to which the question is not of very great importance. We are now coming to the Committee on Military Affairs. Let us stop now; let us quit the work we have begun; and then let us have our fight upon the twenty-first rule. If we cannot go any farther, let us go as far as our Speaker has indicated, and provide that nobody shall introduce political legislation on appropriation bills; that there may be reduction of salaries and similar reductions of expenses, but that we will strike out the possibility of political legislation.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I said that the possibility of political legislation was the cover under which many members on the other side sought to strike down the whole rule, and that I deprecated the striking down of that rule on any such ground.

Mr. HAWLEY. I deprecate any legislation whatever upon appropriation bills. I agree in a great measure with the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] who says that the vicious legislation of the country for some years past has come largely from the Committee on Appropriations in that way. But if nothing better can be done, let us guard ourselves from the possibility of any political legislation, and give our rule the construction which the Speaker has indicated—that salaries may be reduced and similar reductions of expense made on appropriation bills, but that they shall contain nothing in the nature of political legislation.

The House has now the opportunity to save itself. If it goes along in the course it has begun, we shall simply ruin this magnificent report of the committee—a grand improvement upon our present rules. I, for one, shall go for defeating the whole abominable botch, if this report be amended in the manner now threatened.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, the trouble here seems to be this: yesterday some of us who were fighting for equal rights on this floor met the enemy, and we were theirs. To-day we have met them upon the same ground, and they are ours. The result hurts somebody. The fact is, this is simply a fight for power. When I entered this House in the Forty-fifth Congress the first time I asked its attention was in reference to this very vicious rule which is now the subject of discussion. On this subject there is a happy medium upon which I think we can all agree. There are not, I think, a dozen members on either side who will not agree to send every bill appropriating money to the Appropriations Committee if you will strip that committee of the power to incorporate into their bills new legislation. The ground of complaint among members is the immense power that the committee now wields in this House.

I object to having a guardian. I object to sitting here, undertaking to represent my constituents, with a rule over me which says, "You may introduce an amendment to an appropriation bill that reduces expenditures, but if your constituents demand that expenditure in any direction be increased you shall not offer such an amendment; your proposition shall simply go to the chairman of the Committee of the Whole who will decide it out of order; so that you cannot get a vote on it, no matter how just the measure may be."

Let me give you an illustration. I went to the Committee on Appropriations as my friend from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] did. I asked the gentleman in charge of one of the appropriation bills to put upon it an amendment that would not increase expenditures $70 a year. He said it was perfectly right. "Then put it on," said I. "I cannot," he said; "the committee have not authorized it." "Then," said I, "let me submit it to the House." "Oh, no," was the reply, "we must stand by the report of the committee."

That is the power I object to. Two hundred and seventy men in this House are under the guardianship of fifteen. [Applause.] I fight for the equal rights of all. I stand here for the younger members of the House—younger in service, not in age—men who have mettle in them, as my colleague [Mr. BROWNE] has said. They are now under tutelage and guardianship. They cannot get beyond the chairman of the Committee of the Whole in endeavoring to present to the House matters which their constituents demand.

Now, the reason I make this fight with some of my friends is that whenever we force these gentlemen who are now our guardians to distribute the power they now exercise, they will come down handsomely. We shall meet on the ground of statesmanship; we shall then have a compromise by which the business of the House can be done. I say to gentlemen who agree with me that as we have now put a check upon our opponents, all we have to do is to stand our ground, and they will soon come down. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE,] which will be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "other than the appropriations for its support;" so that, as amended, the clause will read:

To the military establishment and the public defense: to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question being put,

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair by the viva voce vote is unable to decide.

Mr. GARFIELD. We may as well have tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection tellers will be ordered.

There being no objection tellers were ordered; and Mr. BROWNE and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 107.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Rules and had come to no resolution thereon.

EFFINGHAM LAWRENCE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting report and papers in reference to the Louisiana private land claim of Effingham Lawrence; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

FORESTRY.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture be requested to forward to this House any facts or statistics in his office on the subject of forestry not heretofore published from his Department.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

STATISTICS OF MERCHANDISE.

Mr. KERNAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to communicate to the Senate the reasons for the order issued by the Treasury Department to the collectors of customs of the United States dated December 15, 1879, and designated "Department number, 175," whereby they are directed, "whenever written requests to that effect shall be filed by shippers or consignees, to cause to be withheld from publication for a period not exceeding ninety days statistics relating to the importation or shipment of any particular merchandise imported or shipped by them."

VIRGINIA COLONIAL HISTORY.

Mr. JOHNSTON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed 1,000 copies of the Transactions of the Virginia Companies of London, of which 50 copies shall be for the Congressional Library, 700 for the House of Representatives, and 250 for the Senate.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I wish to say a word or two in explanation of this resolution. The manuscript records of the Virginia Company of London, now in the Congressional Library, are more than two hundred and fifty years old. The copy there is believed to be the only one in existence. It contains authentic accounts of the whole transactions of the Virginia Company and is invaluable as a history of a portion of our colonial period.

The volumes (there are two of them) were in the possession of the Earl of Southampton, and after his death were purchased from his executors by William Byrd, of Virginia, from whose estate they were obtained by Rev. William Stith, the historian and president of William and Mary College. From him they went into the custody of Peyton Randolph, the first President of the Continental Congress. Mr. Jefferson bought his library, including these two manuscript volumes, and they were among his papers purchased by the United States and are now preserved in the Congressional Library under lock and key.

Under the auspices of this Virginia Company the first permanent English settlement was made on this continent. It instituted a legislative assembly, the members of which were elected by the people. The records are of great historical value and ought to be made accessible to the historian and put beyond the danger of loss or destruction.

I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

HISTORY OF THE COTTON-WORM.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 10,000 additional copies be printed of Bulletin No. 3 of the History of the Cotton-Worm, &c., prepared by Professor Charles V. Riley under the order of the Congress; 7,000 copies for the use of the House and 3,000 for the use of the Senate.

EDWARD BRADEN AND J. W. ANGUS.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 56.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 56) for the relief of Edward Braden and J. W. Angus, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The amendments were, in line 5, after the name "J. W. Angus," to insert "of the District of Columbia, partners, doing business under the firm-name of Edward Braden & Company;" in line 7, after the word "of," to strike out "fourteen" and insert "twelve;" in line 8, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" in the same line, before the word "eight," to strike out "twenty" and insert "forty," and in line 11, after the word "Texas," to insert:

And the said amount of $12,548.39 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full and final settlement and satisfaction of said claim.

So as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Edward Braden, of San Antonio, Texas, and J. W. Angus, of the District of Columbia, partners, doing business under the firm-name of Edward Braden & Company, the sum of $12,548.39 for extra labor and materials expended in the construction of the quartermaster's supply depot at San Antonio, Texas, and the said amount of $12,548.39 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full and final settlement and satisfaction of said claim.

Mr. MAXEY. The firm-name is "Edward Braden & Co." I move that "Company," in line 7, be changed to "Co.," so as to read "Edward Braden & Co.," adopting the firm-name.

The amendment to the amendments was agreed to.

The amendments, as amended, were agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a written or printed report with this bill?

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. MAXEY. The printed report is quite elaborate, probably longer than the Senate would care to hear. I can, if desired, make a statement developing all the points in the report; but the Senator has suggested that the report be read.

Mr. CONKLING. All I want is to get at the facts. If the Senator will give me them, I shall be very glad.

Mr. MAXEY. By an act approved March 3, 1873, seventeenth volume of United States Statutes at Large, page 525, the sum of $100,000 was appropriated for the purpose of erecting "depot buildings, including shops, offices, commissary and quartermaster store-rooms, at San Antonio, Texas." To prevent the lapsing of that appropriation, the contract not having been made in two years, by an act of March 3, 1875, that appropriation was continued and rendered available "for the purpose aforesaid." Under that act the Quartermaster-General, on the 12th of May, 1876, advertised for proposals for the work, and in June, 1876, the contract was bid off to Braden & Co. at the sum of $83,900. On the 7th of June the contract was let out. On the 9th of June, in accordance with a telegraphic order from the Quartermaster-General, the chief quartermaster of the Department of Texas entered into a memorandum contract or agreement with Edward Braden & Co. in strict accordance with their advertisement and with their bid; and that contained this clause:

If it shall be found that foundations of a greater depth than three feet are required, the said Edward Braden & Co. shall be paid therefor extra, at the rate of one cent per cubic foot for all such excavations, and $3.50 per perch extra for all such masonry in excess of the average depth of three feet.

This was reduced to writing on the 9th of June. The day preceding, the Quartermaster-General, by a telegraphic order, thus addressed the chief quartermaster of the Department of Texas:

If J. W. Angus, of Washington, who was a contractor with the centennial branch of this office, is the responsible builder on the bid for the San Antonio depot, signed Braden & Co., award the contract to that firm with good bond of $10,000. Printed plans and specifications from this office are to form a part of the contract, to which contractors' assent may be added—the paper of explanations prepared by Captain Davis. If accepted—

I call attention to this—

If accepted, enter at once into an informal contract, to be replaced on its arrival by a full contract drawn up here, which is merely fuller than the official printed contract and form, but in no essential manner varies from the printed specifications and plans.

When the printed contract was sent down to San Antonio, it omitted this material clause:

If it shall be found that foundations of a greater depth than three feet are required the said Ed. Braden & Co. shall be paid therefor extra, at the rate of one cent per cubic foot for all such excavations, and $3.50 per perch extra for all such masonry in excess of the average depth of three feet.

That clause was omitted by accident, I suppose; at all events, it was omitted. Braden and Angus both swear that when the formal contract was presented, having full faith in the telegraphic order of the Quartermaster-General that the formal contract would in no material degree vary from the informal contract, they signed this contract without reading it, whereby they claim it was signed through a mistake as to the omission of that clause. The officer in charge, Captain Davis, whose report is very full, shows the amount of work which they did below three feet, which was their bid and their accepted bid. The work below three feet I have calculated at one cent per cubic foot, 11,267 cubic feet making $112.67 for the excavation; and five hundred and forty-one perches of masonry at the stipulated rate would be $1,893.50; the two items making $2,006.17, which is the amount allowed on that item. That, in the opinion of the committee, is unquestionably right, because the informal contract was in strict accordance with the advertisement and in strict accordance with their bid, and the failure to insert this clause in the formal contract should not be taken advantage of by the Government. That is one of the items. I will state another item.

There were three distinct plots of grounds in San Antonio which had been bought by the city of San Antonio and tendered for this depot site. The chief quartermaster of the Department of Texas required the contractors to begin on a certain plot, No. 3, I think it was—at all events on a certain plot. They went on in accordance with orders and expended a considerable amount of money there, when the Quartermaster-General required them to change to another plot of ground, he not being satisfied with the plot upon which they were working. The item of eleven hundred and odd dollars is allowed to them for the change of situation which was made by the Government after they had proceeded to do that work.

So much for those two items. They made a claim for a change in the grade of lumber. That claim the committee believed was not sufficient, and they disallowed it.

Mr. CONKLING. What was the second item that the Senator said the committee allowed?

Mr. MAXEY. It was that there had been, as I stated, three plots of ground donated by the city of San Antonio, and the chief quartermaster directed the contractors to go to work on one of them; they did so, and expended a considerable amount of money and labor on that plot; but subsequently the Quartermaster-General here, not liking that location, directed a change to another plot, and they did as ordered. Of course the contractors ought not to suffer by reason of that change.

The principal item is for a better class of masonry than the contract required. The contract required them to build the work in what is designated in the contract as "first-class rubble masonry;" that was the expression used. I should like to refer to the testimony by the officer who had charge of the work, Captain George W. Davis; and I will say for him that, in my judgment, he is one of the most competent men for the task that I know, the same one who now has charge of the Washington Monument here. Captain Davis states that there is no technical meaning for the term "first-class rubble masonry;" that it takes in masonry of stone without being dressed at all, laid up, sometimes with mortar and sometimes without mortar. In this case the work had to be "first-class rubble masonry." He required the joints to be brought to a square; he required the stone to be scabbled as it is called, that is to say, it was to be brought to a plane without being polished or smoothed, and to be laid in mortar. The effect of this was that the character of the work which they were required to do was far beyond anything known among engineers as "first-class rubble masonry." This not being a term of art, the presumption of law, as the committee believe, would be that what was meant by "first-class rubble masonry" in the contract would be that character of first-class masonry known among the people of San Antonio at the time and place where and when the contract was made. Photographs of first-class rubble masonry in San Antonio were taken and compared with this work, and unquestionably, as is reported by every one who has looked at it, this work is far superior to any rubble masonry in the city of San Antonio. Captain Davis reports that; General Ord reports that. A board, consisting of one man selected by the Government, one by the contractors, and a third the leading master-builder of San Antonio, reported it to be far superior. Captain Davis says, on the item of superior masonry, that the difference in cost is fully $1 per perch. The contractors put it at $2 per perch. The board called to investigate this matter placed it at the middle figure, $1.50 per perch, and the committee believing the board to be right put it at that figure. That board was composed of very capable men: Captain Livermore, the chief engineer of the Department of Texas; John S. Mason, lieutenant-colonel Fourth Infantry; and J. H. Kampmann, the leading contractor in the city of San Antonio, composed that board. In approving the report of that board, General Ord says:

It was at my request that Captain Davis was appointed to supervise the building of the depot, and I know how carefully he has guarded the interests of the Government in connection therewith; in fact, he has, by reason of the good will of the contractors, and their desire to accommodate the Government, secured a much better style and quality of work than is found on any stone building ever erected in this town—perhaps the cheapest job of the sort ever done for the Government—and, according to the wording of the contract as to rubble work, better and much more expensive than the contract called for.

They were required to do that much more expensive work by Captain Davis in charge. The Government has not paid them for it. The contract did not require them to do it; and the committee believe, and I think with great propriety, that they should be allowed compensation for it.

Captain Davis gives a full account in his report of how the work was done. He says:

In conclusion, I would state that as the contractors have carried out the contract faithfully, (losing from $5,000 to $10,000 on the job,) having manifested a disposition at all times to acquiesce in all demands made upon them, even though these demands sometimes were thought unfair, and a compliance with them worked against their interests, they are entitled to as much consideration as can be legally and equitably shown.

Another item and the last is in respect of the cornice. The cornice was changed from the contract. The estimate which was placed on that change by the board called to examine it was $1,535. Of this amount $200 was allowed by the Government, leaving $1,335. It was insisted by the Quartermaster-General that that change was not an advantage to the building. Whether that was the case or not, the change was made under the suspervision and control and direction of the officer in charge. The work was done, the material was furnished, and these men ought to be paid for it. He who stands by and is silent when he should speak ought not to be heard when he should be silent.

These items, which have been very carefully investigated by the committee, grow, not out of a new contract, not out of extra compensation, but out of a contract as it was made and reduced to writing by the chief quartermaster of Texas and signed by the contractors on the 9th of June, 1876. These cover all the items. The report of the committee is sustained by copious extracts upon every point.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it seems to me that this bill is well calculated to remind the Senate of a very hazardous practice which I think is on the increase here, a practice under which nobody can foresee to which committee any particular measure will go. Here is a case exceptionally, peculiarly adapted to the Committee on Claims. It is a pure private claim, as I think of a somewhat unusual character. The claimants happen to reside in Texas, although the bill speaks of one of them as residing here being a partner of the other who resides in Texas. These buildings were to be constructed in the State of Texas; and I observe by the bill that the honorable Senator from Texas farthest from me [Mr. COKE] introduced it, and on his motion it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which it happens accidentally that the other Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] is chairman. I do not suppose that the residence of these parties and of the two Senators determined the reference of this bill; and yet I speak of it with great frankness to show, as I think it does, that we should observe, as we have not lately observed, the rules of the Senate which carry a measure to one committee rather than to another.

I have affirmed that this case belonged to the Committee on Claims. To vindicate that assertion and also to allude as far as I shall to the merits of the proposition, I beg to call the attention of the Senate to two or three of its features.

In court this would be to reform a written contract; it would be a bill asking a decree affirming that something which the parties intended to embrace in the contract was omitted, and praying the court to decree that the meaning of a clause inserted in the contract was not the meaning upon which the minds of the parties met. Every lawyer who looks at it will see, I think, that that is the nature of this claim. The claimants allege that having signed a written contract, it did not truly express the agreement, and I find in the contract which they did sign these words:

That it is expressly agreed and stipulated between the parties to this contract that, upon mutual agreement, it may be changed, altered, modified, or abrogated, either in whole or in part; but no such change, alteration, modification, or abrogation shall entitle the said Ed. Braden & Co. to an increase of compensation over that herein specified, except the alteration or modification referred to in the last clause of article 1 of this agreement.

That clause refers to a power reserved by the United States "to make additions to the aforesaid described buildings" or alterations of a kind mentioned.

As I understand this agreement, then, in one of its clauses which it is not sought to reform, one at least of the very changes for which the bill proposes to make compensation, and, as I think, two of them were reserved to the party of one part. Upon that state of case, ex parte affidavits are presented in which the affiants were the parties themselves. It is possible there is some other affiant. I look at this report now for the first time, and I find the ex parte affidavits of the parties themselves pointing out what they allege to be the equitable merits of their claim and the hardship which came to them in executing this contract which they seek to have abrogated as it stands and for the purpose of their claim established in different form and different substance.

Now, Mr. President, if there can be a more illusory, uncertain mode of investigating a case of this sort than must occur when it is done upon ex parte affidavits, I can hardly think of it; and I should like to inquire of the Senator from Texas why this case should not go to the Court of Claims?

Mr. MAXEY. I am not aware of any reason why it should go to the Court of Claims. It is just like many other claims that are presented here in cases of disagreement between the Quartermaster-General and the contractors. Army cases of this kind have ordinarily, so far as has come under my observation, gone to the Committee on Military Affairs for action. I know of no reason why this should go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I was not at the moment on the question of whether it should have gone to the Military Committee or not, as between that committee and the Committee on Claims; but as the Senator alludes to that, does he mean that it has been the custom of the Senate to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs private claims for damages or extra compensation to contractors in erecting depot buildings, shops, offices, commissary and quartermasters' storehouses. I think the Senator will hardly say that if he speaks only of that brief period covered by my service in the Senate, and I am confident that the late chairman of the Committee on Claims and the present chairman will bear me out in saying that such petitions go usually, if not always, to the Committee on Claims. But the question I put to the honorable Senator was this: Why should this case be tried before the Committee on Claims or the Committee on Military Affairs in this way? Why should it not be tried as it would between any other two contracting parties? In short, why should it not go to the Court of Claims where both sides can be heard? I do not know but that there may be some statutory difficulty in the way or something which does not occur to me, and therefore I ask the honorable Senator for information on that point. Unless there be something in the way I think I shall venture to submit a motion myself that this be referred to the Court of Claims; but if there be something in the statute which does not occur to me removing it from the customary jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, of course that might change it.

It is quite impossible, Mr. President, for me to understand in detail the merits of this matter; and I beg to assure the Senator from Texas that I intend to express no opinion about them. It would be presumptuous for me to do it; indeed I might say that it would be I think quite impossible for any committee, however intelligently constituted, to understand, upon the papers which are annexed to this report, in the sense in which a court of justice ought to understand, or in the sense in which private contesting parties would insist upon its being understood, the length and breadth of this controversy. I think, if it were to be passed upon here at all, it certainly should go as other such cases do, to the committee constituted for that purpose. But if it had been before the Committee on Claims, I should say that a bill to reform a contract, to reconstruct it, and then to allow equitable compensation for what under the reformed contract would not as I understand it be due, would be an appeal to congressional discretion which certainly ought not to be listened to if another tribunal can be found in which the decision should be vested; and I shall move at the proper time, if that is not disagreeable to the honorable Senator from Texas, that this claim be submitted to the Court of Claims, in order not only that these parties, but that the representatives of the Government may be heard before a tribunal adapted for such a case.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, first, I am not, as the Senator from New York is under the impression I am, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. Second, the bill was introduced by my colleague on his own account, and without my knowledge; and the reference was requested by him to be made to the Committee on Military Affairs of his own motion, and the Senate ordered the case before the Committee on Military Affairs. Third, the case fell to me in the ordinary administration of the business of the Committee on Military Affairs without my asking for it. It simply happened to fall in my charge in the distribution of work made by the chairman of that committee.

I have thus answered those points. I presume the Senate thought, certainly the Committee on Military Affairs thought, that it was properly before that committee, because it was an Army claim. All the evidences in respect to it were to be found in the Department with which that committee had to do, and nowhere else, and the case was tried mainly, as will be seen, first, upon the official report made by Captain Davis, the officer in charge, to the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army; second, upon the report of the board called for the purpose of arbitrating this matter by the commanding general of the Department of Texas; and, third, upon the approval of the work of that board by the commanding general of the Department of Texas, in which that officer approved of this claim. I will state that every item which is here allowed was allowed by the board of officers, one of whom was selected by the commanding general of the Department of Texas, a Government captain of engineers, one selected by the parties, and the third selected by mutual agreement, and himself an officer of the United States Army. Thus the evidence here is, first, the evidence of the officer placed in charge of the work; second, the evidence of the board that went personally and examined that work; and, third, the evidence of the commanding general of the Department of Texas, whose headquarters are where this work was done, and who himself states that—

It was at my request that Captain Davis was appointed to supervise the building of the depot—

He was appointed by the Quartermaster-General, not by these parties—and I know how carefully he has guarded the interests of the Government in connection therewith; in fact, he has, by reason of the good will of the contractors, and their desire to accommodate the Government, secured a much better style and quality of work than is found on any stone building ever erected in this town—perhaps the cheapest job of the sort ever done for the Government—and, according to the wording of the contract as to rubble-work, better and much more expensive than the contract called for.

So that the testimony here is not ex parte statements; it is the official statements of those having charge of this work. The preliminary contract is in writing; the final contract is in writing; they are there to show for themselves, and they are not ex parte. They are signed on behalf of the United States, by the chief quartermaster of the Department of Texas, and by the contractors in their own right. I therefore do not see where the ex parte testimony comes in, save and except in the affidavits of the two contractors, one of whom General Meigs says resided in the District of Columbia at the time the contract was made. He indorses him, because he says if he is the responsible party close the contract. The other resides in the State of Texas; and an intimation appears to have been thrown out by the Senator from New York that because he resided in the State of Texas, therefore the Senator who reported the bill would be more inclined to look favorably upon him than if he resided elsewhere. I beg to say to that Senator——

Mr. CONKLING. I did not say that, if the honorable Senator will allow me.

Mr. MAXEY. I thought that was the intimation thrown out.

Mr. CONKLING. On the contrary I disclaimed that. I will state very frankly what I said and what I meant. I was arguing that we ought to observe the rules of the Senate in the distribution of business, and I said that one of the Senators from Texas introduced the bill in behalf of contractors living in Texas and gave it an unusual reference, as I thought, to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which it happened the other Senator from Texas was chairman, and thus we had presented an appearance which I disclaimed and which I thought it was desirable to avoid, owing to the coincidence of these facts, whereas if it had gone in the regular direction there would be no room for any such suggestion.

Mr. MAXEY. I have already stated that I am not chairman of that committee and never was.

Mr. CONKLING. Of which committee?

Mr. MAXEY. The Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator reports the bill from that committee. I should have said "the organ of the committee." He is chairman as to this bill perhaps, the organ of the committee making this report.

Mr. MAXEY. I have already said that the reference was made to the Committee on Military Affairs without my knowledge, and the work fell to me in the due course of business, assigned to me as a great many other cases are. I will now further state that the idea did not occur to the Committee on Military Affairs that the reference was improperly made. The chairman of the Committee on Claims, who is about as guarded as any one I know, and about as faithful in the discharge of his duties as any one I know, happens to be also a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. No objection was made (and he was present) to the reference to the Committee on Military Affairs. Consequently there is nothing in that point.

Now, a word in regard to the proposed reference to the Court of Claims. I think if the Senator from New York will examine these official papers to which I have referred as the evidence he will see that there is nothing here which would require the light of the Court of Claims to come to this Senate. If the case were to go before the Court of Claims what could be done? The evidence which the contractors offer is from the Government officers, the official reports made by those Government officers. The officer in charge of the work, known by all who know him to be competent, now put in charge of the Washington Monument here, a faithful, conscientious officer, says that the contractors often thought he was too severe upon them. He himself reports, not these contractors but he himself reports that there is no artistic definition of the words "rubble masonry;" that that is not a term of art, and that he did require far better work than was required in the city of San Antonio, where this work was done, and that it is reasonable to suppose these contractors would assume that the style of work there would be that which would control the case; and when the photographs were submitted to the Quartermaster-General by Captain Davis, the officer in charge, the reply of the Quartermaster-General upon examining those photographs and comparing the work at the San Antonio depot with the work in the city of San Antonio, he said "the comparison might as well be made with jacals," which in the Mexican language is the lowest character of stick and mud building, "as with the bad masonry of partition walls of stores;" and Captain Davis replied to him, "I was not speaking of a cabin hut; I was comparing this work with structures of rubble masonry in the city of San Antonio." I hold that while the term is not a term of art, while "rubble masonry," as is said by the engineer in charge of the work, has different meanings, the term was well known in San Antonio, and hundreds of buildings are there built of rubble work, and the contractors had a right to assume that "the best rubble masonry" meant the character of "the best rubble masonry" when and where the contract was made; and the engineer officer reports that this is far better work than the best rubble masonry found in San Antonio, and their contract only called for rubble masonry; and the board which examined the work makes the same report, and General Ord makes the same report, the officer in charge of that department.

I may state here that I was in the city of San Antonio last fall and I examined all the public buildings connected with the Army at that place, which is the headquarters of the Department of Texas. I examined this work fully, thoroughly, and faithfully in the various rooms, in the top of the tower, everywhere, and my deliberate judgment is, just as General Ord expresses it, that it is the cheapest job of work ever done for the American Government. As the work was done according to their bid and according to the informal contract, and grew out of that and was accepted by the Government, it does seem to me in justice and fair dealing that the contractors should have their pay.

If it had been desired to refer this matter to the Committee on Claims, I will say to the Senator from New York it would have been a source of very great pleasure to me, because I spent day after day thoroughly searching out and conscientiously investigating this claim in order to arrive at what I believed to be the merits of the case. The full report, if the Senate will consider it, will show that the conclusion at which the Committee on Military Affairs arrived was a just and righteous conclusion.

Mr. McMILLAN. Has the Senator from Texas stated why this claim was not referred by the Committee on Military Affairs to the Court of Claims? Was there any reason appearing in the examination?

Mr. MAXEY. Because the Committee on Military Affairs saw nothing whatever which made any demand upon them to refer the case to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims, as I understand it, is where there is a contest or some disagreement in regard to evidence, or some fact to be elicited by proof not accessible by the committee to its satisfaction.

Mr. McMILLAN. Was there not a dispute between the Government and these claimants as to the allowance of this claim?

Mr. MAXEY. The only disagreement between the Government and the claimants grows out of these written papers, and all the light which the Court of Claims could possibly throw on the case is thrown on the case by the memorandum contract, which is in writing, the final contract, which is in writing, the report of the officer in charge, which is in writing, the report of the board of arbitrators, which is in writing, and the approval thereof by the commander of the Department of Texas, which is also in writing. Hence the committee believed there was no necessity for referring it to the Court of Claims.

Mr. THURMAN. Before my friend sits down, will he answer me one question? I see, on looking over the report, that Captain Davis approved the claim, and that a board appointed by the Quartermaster-General of the War Department also made a favorable report. Now, I wish to know why the claim was not allowed by the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. MAXEY. The claim was presented to the Quartermaster-General, and because of his refusal the claim comes here.

Mr. THURMAN. There is another question I should like to ask my friend—whether there is any difficulty in prosecuting a suit against the United States in the Court of Claims on this contract?

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Ohio is much more familiar with that point than I am myself. The contract was closed on the 9th of June, 1876. It was made on the 7th of June verbally, and reduced to writing on the 9th of June.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Court of Claims has jurisdiction for six years.

Mr. McMILLAN. The jurisdiction of the Court of Claims is defined by section 1059 of the Revised Statutes. The first provision of that section enumerates:

First. All claims founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an Executive Department, or upon any contract, expressed or implied, with the Government of the United States, and all claims which may be referred to it by either House of Congress.

The statute limiting the time within which a claim may be prosecuted before that tribunal is contained in section 1069 of the Revised Statutes:

Every claim against the United States, cognizable by the Court of Claims, shall be forever barred unless the petition setting forth a statement thereof is filed in the court, or transmitted to it by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives as provided by law, within six years after the claim first accrues.

With a certain proviso excepting certain cases. It has been the invariable practice of the Committee on Claims when a case referred to it appeared to be within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to report the case back to the Senate and ask that it be indefinitely postponed for that reason, and the party referred to the Court of Claims for his remedy. That has always seemed to be the only proper and the only safe way of disposing of these claims. Congress has provided a judicial tribunal in which all these matters may be examined by judicial process, and to take any case out of the jurisdiction of that court would be a precedent which would be very injurious in the practice of the Congress of the United States; it would be a precedent that it seems to me would lead to very injurious results.

There must be a dispute here between the Government and these claimants. The Quartermaster-General of the Army, representing the Government of the United States, has refused to allow the claim made here by these parties. The evidence submitted to the Quartermaster Department is that upon which the Committee on Military Affairs have acted. If it is so plain as to admit of no doubt, it would seem that the Quartermaster-General should have allowed the claim. The Government, therefore, must have some ground upon which it rests as a defense against the claim set up by these parties, and that issue should be tried by a court having jurisdiction of the claim where the parties can be heard, the proofs upon either side addressed to the court, and the matter passed to judgment regularly. The parties will then if they have a good claim be secure, and the judgment will be paid. But this is a precedent which I think we should not set. The matter it seems to me should be referred to the Court of Claims, and I certainly shall support the motion of the Senator from New York in that direction.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota desires to know why this matter does not go to the Court of Claims and what is the cause of dispute, why the Quartermaster-General did not allow the claim. I endeavored in the plainest language that I knew how to use to show that in the informal contract or memorandum agreement in article 2, found on page 10 of the report, this agreement was made:

If it shall be found that foundations of a greater average depth than three feet are required, the said Ed. Braden & Co. shall be paid therefor extra, at the rate of one cent per cubic foot for all such excavation, and $3.50 per perch extra for all such masonry in excess of an average depth of three feet.

I have shown that in the Quartermaster-General's telegraphic dispatch, in which he asked the question whether Angus of the District of Columbia was the responsible contractor, he stated:

Enter at once into an informal contract, to be replaced on its arrival by a full contract drawn up here, which is merely fuller than the official printed contract and form, but in no essential manner varies from the printed specifications and plans.

I have shown that this clause as to excavation below three feet was left out of the formal contract. I have shown that it was in the informal contract. I have shown that the Quartermaster-General telegraphed that the formal contract would not vary essentially from the informal contract. By that omission these parties are deprived of one cent per cubic foot for every foot below three feet and are deprived of the three and a half dollars per perch for every perch below three feet; and the officer in charge says that their account for this work done below three feet is right. That is what the officer in charge of the work, Captain Davis, says, and that report is thoroughly conscientious in my judgment.

I have shown that both the informal and formal contract called only for "the best rubble masonry." I have shown that the expression "best rubble masonry" is not an expression of art; it has no technical meaning, it differs everywhere. I have shown that the work done is far better than "the best rubble masonry" known at the place where the contract was entered into at the time of that contract. I have shown it by the officer in charge of the work, placed there by the Government, and shown it by the commanding general of the Department of Texas, also placed there by the Government. I have shown it by the board of arbitrators who arbitrated this question. How, then, I ask, could any government claiming to do justice to its citizens refuse to pay them? The contract was made in good faith; the informal contract was reduced to writing, showing what the contractors were to get; and when this great, long, formal contract was presented, both of them swear, one that he was in charge of one hundred hands when it was presented to him, and he signed it without reading, not doubting that it was exactly as the informal contract, and the other that he was busy and signed it without reading. Both of them swear to this, and one of them is indorsed by the Quartermaster-General as a good man.

A careful computation of the committee, as well as of the officers, shows that these items are allowable under the contract, because I hold that the true and real contract is to be found in the proposals made by the Government, the acceptance by bid of those proposals, the execution of the bond in accordance with the terms of the bid, and the informal memorandum agreement which was made, and which the Quartermaster-General should not have varied by the formal contract; and this would be, if it were in a court of chancery, a bill to reform the writing.

Now there is no need for the case to go to the Court of Claims unless the court could throw before us some light that we have not got, for that is the only object. I have given the testimony of Government officers, and it is for us in my judgment to do justice. Here the officer in charge of the work says the contractors lost from five to ten thousand dollars after they had been required by him to do what they did not believe they were required by the contract to do. General Ord says it is the best rubble masonry by far in the city of San Antonio and the cheapest Government work, he believes, in the country, and I have not a doubt that that is literally true, because Captain Davis is one of the most careful controllers of public work there is in this Government. If, then, the Senate can from the documentary evidence which is introduced here satisfy themselves of the justice of this claim, it does seem to me that we have the power to do justice to a citizen who has faithfully performed his work, as shown by the report of the officer in charge of the work, and who has done that work at a heavy loss. If he has shown that under his contract he is entitled to relief, I think he clearly ought to receive it from Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the claim of Edward Braden and J. W. Angus for extra compensation for the construction of the supply building and shops at San Antonio, Texas, be referred to the Court of Claims, to be heard and determined according to law and justice.

The Senator from Texas says very properly that all he wants is justice for these contractors. Certainly that they should have, and I hope therefore the Senator from Texas will find no objection to the amendment which I have offered. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN] has already reminded the Senate of the fact that the statute as it stands contemplates this very case, because it clothes the Court of Claims with jurisdiction in all cases of contract express or implied, and directs that all resolutions with the accompanying document relating to matters of this sort shall be transmitted by the Secretary of the Senate and by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the Court of Claims. The statute of limitations does not stand in the way; it is six years. May, 1876, was the date of this transaction. May, 1882, would be the time when the statute of limitations would lay hold of it; but if that were otherwise this amendment that I offer would carry jurisdiction, despite the lapse of time, to the court. The statute as it stands directs, as I have already said, the transmission of all papers; so that this seems to be the very case and this the complete proceeding which will insure justice to the claimants.

Mr. MAXEY. I trust that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York will not be adopted. The merits and nature and character of the case are fully in possession of the Senate, and there is no reason, in my judgment, why it should be referred to the court.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONKLING called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Secretary calls the roll, I feel minded to make one remark about this amendment in the hope of attracting the attention of Senators who may not have regarded it before.

Here is a private claim by two contractors alleging that the contract which they admit they signed did not express the contract they made, and then asking that a departure shall be adjudged by the Senate from the contract they did make in order to pay them extra compensation. This amendment proposes that the papers, all of them which the committee had, and the evidence shall be carried down to that tribunal constituted on purpose to adjudge such cases. The honorable Senator from Texas says that his constituents, the claimants, want only justice, that he wants only justice for them, and yet he divides the Senate in resisting this amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I have only to ask in reply what light can the Court of Claims throw on this case? Here is the informal contract in writing, here is the telegram from the Quartermaster-General, saying in terms that the formal contract shall not materially vary from that, and here is the formal contract itself, and the parties show why they had overlooked that clause of it which did vary the informal contract.

Mr. CONKLING. To that, Mr. President, I make two answers. First what can the Court of Claims do, or what shall it do in any case, if not in this? If there is any reason for it stated by the Senator from Texas, it is that this case is so plain that, although matter of fact, it is not a question of fact because it is palpable and fixed. If that be so, I say in the second place it does not lie in the mouth of these claimants to object to a submission to a court which without the delay of taking testimony, but on a case made up, has nothing to do but to adjudicate it.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to say simply in reply, that these claimants, like all others who have expended their labor and money, have a right to speedy justice. We have the power to grant it. If the Senate believes that justice can be done here, then these claimants ought not to be delayed one hour in getting their money.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, in the case of John C. Comfort, which was before the Committee on Claims, Senate bill No. 417, an adverse report was submitted on the 7th of January, 1880, which was made by me to the Committee on Claims. I quote the law in regard to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims.

The law provides, section 1059, Revised Statutes United States:

> The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the following matters:
>
> First. All claims founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an Executive Department, or upon any contract, expressed or implied, with the Government of the United States, and all claims which may be referred to it by either House of Congress.

Now, this is the section to which I desire to call the special attention of the Senate.

> SEC. 1060. All petitions and bills praying or providing for the satisfaction of private claims against the Government, founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an Executive Department, or upon any contract, expressed or implied, with the Government of the United States, shall, unless otherwise ordered by resolution of the House in which they are introduced, be transmitted by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, with all the accompanying documents, to the Court of Claims.
> SEC. 1069. Every claim against the United States, cognizable by the Court of Claims, shall be forever barred unless the petition setting forth a statement thereof is filed in the court, or transmitted to it by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives as provided by law, within six years after the claim first accrues.

That was clearly the expression of the view of Congress, that all these claims should upon their presentation to the Senate or the House go, unless the Senate or the House should order otherwise, to the Court of Claims. I presume that the order of reference as usually made would be considered such an order as would prevent the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House from transmitting these claims directly to the Court of Claims; but it was certainly the intention of Congress when this law was passed in 1868 that no private claim should be passed upon in Congress. The Comfort case is a case of a contract for building cemetery walls in various States, and the committee reported adversely because the Court of Claims had jurisdiction.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the Senator may proceed further and state whether that has not been the invariable practice of the Committee on Claims in cases of that kind.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Minnesota was chairman of the committee longer than I have been. My recollection is that that has been the general rule of the committee, and I can speak for myself unequivocally that it has been the rule in all cases which have been referred to me as a sub-committee.

Mr. MAXEY. The statute reads "unless otherwise ordered." Whenever the Senate is satisfied with the evidence, there is no need for the reference. I do not know how it is with the Committee on Claims, but we have claims of a private nature reported against the Government almost every day by that committee. This is just such a claim as is customarily settled by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to say a word. According to the statement of the Senator from Texas it would seem that some part of this claim at least rests upon solid foundations of legal justice and that these gentlemen are not insisting upon being paid what they were not entitled to be paid by the stipulations of the Government. That is his statement. I have not had time to go through with the facts, but according to the facts as he states them, it would seem to be so; and yet having responsible and respectable officers of the Government whose duty it would be under these contracts and arrangements to pay these gentlemen, we find that these officers do not pay them. There is therefore some kind of a controversy. By "controversy" I do not mean a personal dispute or quarrel, but I mean simply that there is a difference of opinion between the officers whom the law has employed upon one side and the gentlemen who did this work upon the other.

Now, it does seem to me true that the law has provided for a tribunal in which both parties can be patiently heard upon the evidence much better than we can hear them, and which can settle exactly what ought to be done in such a case. So far as I can see, there is no want of jurisdiction in the Court of Claims over this case at all. The statute of limitations has not run. It is one of the very class of cases that the act creating the court was designed to have them try, because it was supposed they could do it better than we could do it with the press of affairs and so numerous a body as we are. I should hope, therefore, that there would be no objection on the part of my honorable friend from Texas to taking the ordinary course which the chairman of the Committee on Claims says that committee always requires to be done in a case where there is no obstacle to the administration of justice in the Court of Claims.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I am not prepared to give my views on the merits of the bill which has been explained by the Senator from Texas, but I will make a few remarks upon the propriety of referring this matter to the Court of Claims.

It is true, as has been suggested by several Senators, and as stated by the Senator from Texas, that this claim does arise upon a contract and therefore prima facie under the law establishing the Court of Claims it would go to that court. But the Senate will bear in mind that the Court of Claims is purely a statutory court; and when the law of 1855 was passed organizing the court and giving it jurisdiction of matters of contract against the United States, it did not say that Congress should not pass upon those matters separately if they saw proper; it did not say moreover that Congress should not repeal that act in whole or pro tanto; it did not say that Congress should not take from the court, at any time it saw proper, jurisdiction in one case or in many cases. The whole matter, in other words, is in the hands of Congress. Here comes a case that has been introduced in the Senate and referred to a committee; and section 1060 has been complied with because it has been "otherwise ordered" by the Senate in which the bill has been introduced by a resolution of reference to the Committee on Military Affairs. It might have properly been referred to the Committee on Claims. The line of demarkation as regards the matter of reference of particular claims or of particular bills and petitions and memorials sometimes is very dim and very shadowy. In this case I conceive that either the Military Committee or the Committee on Claims could well take jurisdiction of it.

The Senate has already referred it to the Committee on Military Affairs. To that extent it has repealed the law organizing the Court of Claims, which it had a right to do, and which it always has a right to do, and which it has done repeatedly. As it gave the jurisdiction it can take it away, whether for one purpose or for many purposes. It says as to this particular claim, notwithstanding the original act giving jurisdiction to the Court of Claims, and notwithstanding section 1060, we are competent to examine the matter for ourselves, and we propose to do it through the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a mistake I think that Senators commit when they say that this matter must necessarily go to the Court of Claims. It must go there necessarily if Congress does not otherwise determine. The Senate in which the bill originated had determined that it should go to its committee; the committee has reported; the question now is, is the Senate or is Congress competent to deal with it? We have in our hands the report of the Senator from Texas representing the committee, in which he states all the testimony, all the facts, everything connected with the claim coming through governmental sources. All this is before the Senate. Is the Senate competent to deal with the question? If it is, the reference to the Court of Claims is unnecessary, and is a piece of supererogation.

Mr. EATON. One word, Mr. President. I hardly think my honorable friend from Arkansas will insist that the mere sending of a petition to a committee when not a single member of the Senate knows anything with regard to the subject-matter of that petition is a repeal so far of a law of Congress; and therefore, while having perfect confidence in the Committee on Military Affairs, perfect confidence in their integrity, as I have in the integrity of every other committee of this Senate, I am disposed myself to let this case go where it belongs, to the Court of Claims.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll on the amendment of Mr. CONKLING.

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea;" and he, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] This is not a political question and I vote "yea," but I will withdraw my vote if it is desired.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to state that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] and my colleague [Mr. WALKER] are both detained at their rooms on account of indisposition.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg leave to state that my colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired on all political questions, being detained at his home by sickness. That accounts for his absence.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I voted to instruct the Senator from Texas to report the bill. I change my vote, and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 22; as follows:

MILITARY WARRANT LAND LOCATIONS.

Mr. MCDONALD. I wish to call attention to Senate bill No. 19, which I gave notice some days ago that I would move to take up to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana, pursuant to notice heretofore given by him, asks the Senate now to consider the bill (S. No. 19) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCDONALD. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] desires that this bill shall stand over for still another day, saying that he is engaged in an examination of the statutes referred to in the bill. It embraces a good many statutes, and involves very important questions to quite a number of States. I am perfectly willing to accommodate the Senator from Vermont or any other Senator in regard to a matter of this kind, but I should like to have it understood that the bill shall be taken up on Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection that this bill be considered on Monday next after the morning hour?

Mr. MCDONALD. I will state that the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, gave notice that he would move to take up the Geneva award bill on Monday; but I understand from him that he is willing that it shall be laid aside after the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] has made his remarks upon it. I have no objection to that. Let this bill be considered on Monday next without conflicting with that, the understanding being that after the Senator from Illinois has addressed the Senate, this bill shall then be taken up for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to that suggestion; and that will be the order.

Mr. PADDOCK. I did not understand the order in reference to the first bill mentioned by the Senator which had the right of way to-day. Was it for disposition on Monday next?

Mr. MCDONALD. On Monday next.

Mr. PADDOCK. There will be no further postponement thereafter, I hope.

Mr. MCDONALD. After the morning hour on Monday without any further delay, at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Illinois on the Geneva award bill.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3336) to prescribe the time of service of jurors was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 93) for printing the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR CHANDLER.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report favorably the resolution I send to the Chair, with an amendment, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the following concurrent resolution, submitted by Mr. FERRY on the 2d instant:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 12,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Zachariah Chandler be printed; 8,000 for the use of the House of Representatives and 4,000 for the use of the Senate; and the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Chandler to accompany the same.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was, to add:

And for the purpose of defraying the expense of procuring the said portrait the sum of $500 be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Maryland to the fact that this should be a joint resolution, as it appropriates money.

Mr. WHYTE. I thought it was a joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be amended in that respect.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 75) to print the eulogies in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Zachariah Chandler was read three times, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DANVILLE, VIRGINIA.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 325.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 325) for the erection of a public building at Danville, Virginia.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, after the word "exceeding," in line 7, to strike out "sixty" and insert "seventy," and after the word "dollars," in line 8, to insert:

To be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall procure the site and cause proper plans and estimates to be made so that no expenditure shall be made or authorized for the full completion of said building beyond the sum hereby appropriated, on a site at least sixty feet removed from any other building.

So as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed at Danville, Virginia, a building for the accommodation of the circuit and district courts of the United States, the post-office, and internal-revenue officers, at a cost not exceeding $70,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, &c.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am authorized by the committee to offer some amendments to their amendment. In line 12 I move to strike out the words "on a site" and insert "the building shall be," and in line 13 to strike out "sixty" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

And the building shall be at least forty feet removed from any other building.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "the," in line 15, to strike out "land and building" and insert "site;" so as to read:

Provided, That no money shall be used or applied for the purpose mentioned until a valid title for the site shall be vested in the United States, and until the State of Virginia shall cede to the General Government jurisdiction over the property, and exempt the same from taxation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CONVERSION OF GOLD BANKS.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 857) authorizing the conversion of national gold banks.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The amendments were, in line 4, after the word "of," to strike out "section 5185 of the Revised Statutes" and insert "the laws;" in line 5, after the word "manner," to insert "and subject to the provisions;" in line 7, after the words "fifty-one hundred and fifty-four," to insert "of the Revised Statutes of the United States;" in line 9, after the word "State," to insert "cease to be gold banks and;" in line 11, after the word "and," to strike out "fifty-three" and insert "thirty-three;" in line 14, after the word "are," to insert "by law;" and at the end of the bill to add:

Provided, That all certificates of organization which shall be issued under this act shall bear the date of the original organization of each bank respectively as a gold bank.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, let us hear the bill read as it stands with all these amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That any national gold bank organized under the provisions of the laws of the United States may, in the manner and subject to the provisions prescribed by section 5154 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for the conversion of banks incorporated under the laws of any State, cease to be a gold bank, and become such an association as is authorized by section 5133, for carrying on the business of banking, and shall have the same powers and privileges, and shall be subject to the same duties, responsibilities, and rules, in all respects, as are by law prescribed for such associations: Provided, That all certificates of organization which shall be issued under this act shall bear the date of the original organization of each bank respectively as a gold bank.

Mr. GARLAND. Is there a report with the bill?

Mr. BAYARD. There is no written report.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the force of these words: "shall be subject to the same duties, responsibilities, and rules, in all respects, as are by law prescribed for such associations?" What are "such associations,"—gold banks or the national banks?

Mr. BAYARD. The national banks, the associations into which these banks now propose to come.

Mr. CONKLING. So that the force of this is to apply the statutes touching the national banks to these banks?

Mr. BAYARD. Those are the banks here referred to, because these banks will pass out of existence when this bill is enacted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. BREWER. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock, and the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour, being the bill (H. R. No. 4219) to amend sections 1, 2, 3, and 10 of an act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and regulating the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1875, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. CULBERSON,] on which he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I present this bill under instructions of the Committee on the Judiciary, and in doing so I desire to state that while in my opinion it does not present a full and adequate relief for the evils which have followed the legislation of Congress extending the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, it will, if it shall become a law, afford some relief, and as much perhaps as we may reasonably hope to secure under the circumstances which attend legislation in Congress at this time.

I propose as briefly as possible to call the attention of the House to the changes in existing law proposed by the bill under consideration.

The first amendment proposes to change the minimum jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States from $500 to $2,000, exclusive of costs and interest.

It will be remembered that the present minimum jurisdiction of the circuit courts was fixed at $500 by the act of 1789. It is believed in view of the unprecedented growth of business and the great increase of population since 1789 that $2,000 exclusive of interest and costs would not be too large. The present minimum was fixed when the population of the country did not exceed four millions, and when the business of the country as compared with present circumstances was undeveloped.

In almost all the States of the Union the circuit courts are crowded and overloaded with business. It is almost impossible in many of the States to accomplish an end to litigation in those courts. This condition of affairs is attributable mainly to the small amount at which the minimum jurisdiction is fixed, the enlarged subject-matter of jurisdiction, and the facility and ease by which causes may be removed from State to Federal courts.

The Supreme Court, with jurisdiction of appeals, with a minimum limit of $5,000, and a revisory jurisdiction of other causes, without regard to the sum or amount in controversy, is unable to dispose of the business which has accumulated upon its docket.

Mr. MANNING. I am told by the clerk of the Supreme Court that it has now eleven hundred and thirteen cases on its docket.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the increase of the minimum jurisdiction of the circuit courts from five hundred to two thousand dollars, as proposed, would not operate to lessen the business of the Supreme Court over that class of cases where the minimum limit is fixed at $5,000, but it would diminish the business of the circuit courts by withdrawing from them cognizance of causes under $2,000, and consequently relieve the Supreme Court of that class of business which now finds its way into that court for revision.

How to relieve the courts of the vast accumulation of business, reduce the expenses of the judiciary, which have grown from a million to three millions of dollars, and promote the convenience of the people, has become a vexed question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CULBERSON. I prefer, Mr. Speaker, to make my statement without interruption.

My friend, Mr. MANNING, from Mississippi, has introduced a proposition to increase the number of judges of the Supreme Court from nine to twenty-one. His bill has been maturely considered and prepared with great care and ability. Should this measure become a law it would be necessary to follow it with another, increasing the number of circuits and circuit judges, until the expense of such enlarged judicial machinery would become intolerable.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question pertinent to the subject to which he is now directing the attention of the House?

Mr. CULBERSON. I decline to yield. There are various propositions pending in Congress to change the judiciary, but all of them, or nearly so, tend to enlarge the judicial system and greatly augment the expenses of that department of the Government.

The next amendment of the act of 1875 proposed by this bill is to insert before the clauses giving the court jurisdiction of controversies between citizens of different States, or between citizens of a State and foreign states, citizens or subjects, a provision requiring the matter in dispute to exceed the sum or value of $2,000, exclusive of costs and interest.

There are, it will be observed, provisions made for suits in the circuit courts of the United States in certain specified cases, on account of the subject-matter without regard to citizenship and on account of citizenship without regard to the subject-matter. Some doubts have been expressed as to the true construction of that clause of section 1 of the act of 1875, and the committee, in order to free the subject of all doubt, suggest that the minimum amount which controls the jurisdiction in such cases shall be inserted as stated.

If this amendment is agreed to, the circuit court cannot take original cognizance of a suit of a civil nature at law or in equity arising under the Constitution or the laws of the United States or treaties made by their authority, nor of such a suit between citizens of different States or citizens of a State and foreign States, citizens or subjects, unless the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of $2,000, exclusive of interest and costs. The United States can maintain a suit without regard to amount, and so where lands are claimed under grants of different States by citizens of the same State, the value of the land does not constitute an element of jurisdiction.

The next amendment provides that when a controversy is between citizens of different States, suit shall be brought only in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or defendant.

The next change proposed arises on that clause of the first section of the act of 1875 which reads as follows:

Nor shall any circuit or district court have cognizance of any suit founded on contract in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover thereon, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of promissory notes negotiable by the law merchant and bills of exchange.

The law of 1789 on this subject reads as follows:

Nor shall any district or circuit court have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made.

It will be seen, therefore, that the jurisdiction of the Federal courts has been largely extended by the act of 1875 in this respect.

Assignees of promissory notes and bills of exchange, foreign and domestic, have the right to sue in the Federal courts by virtue of this provision of the law, without regard to the original status of the parties to the instrument.

Under the act of 1789 an assignee of a note, and indeed of any chose in action, could not maintain a suit unless suit might have been prosecuted in the court if no assignment had been made. Only one exception was made, and that in cases of foreign bills of exchange.

We propose to strike out the exception as it exists in the act of 1875, and restore the exception as it existed in the act of 1789.

The enlargement of the jurisdiction of those courts by the exception contained in the act of 1875 has operated to increase largely the business of the circuit and Supreme Courts of the United States, and no subject of litigation has contributed more to swell and overload the dockets of the courts than the jurisdiction over negotiable instruments held by assignees. This supply of business should be cut off and the holders of such evidences of debt remitted to the courts of the States, which now have concurrent jurisdiction. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that if Congress had been devising a method by which to block up business in the circuit courts, to increase the burdens and expenses of litigation and at the same time prepare an easy mode by which the gravest frauds could be practiced upon the jurisdiction of the courts, it could have adopted a more successful one.

We all agree that the expenses of litigation are much more onerous in the Federal than in the State courts. And this does not arise alone from the inconvenience to which litigants are subjected. The payee of a promissory note or of a bill of exchange may not desire to sue the maker in the courts of the State where both maker and payee reside. The contract is between citizen and citizen, and the courts of the domicile of both parties are open to adjust the dispute. It would be an easy effort on the part of the maker to make good his defense, if sued in the vicinity of his residence, where the contract was made and where he had a right to expect—in case a defense arose—to have the matter determined, but under the law as it now exists the payee can assign his chose in action to a citizen of another State, either for or without consideration, and by such assignment enable the assignee to sue the maker in a Federal court, oftentimes hundreds of miles from his home. Those of us who have had occasion to observe the operation of this statute have not failed to note the hardship and frequently the great injustice to persons who had meritorious defenses. Except the amount in controversy be large the expenses of a defense under such circumstances deter prudent litigants from incurring them, since it is a matter of total indifference as to what result may be attained as the expenses of a successful defense often exceed the amount demanded.

It may be said that the assignee of a note who resides in a different State from the maker should be allowed to sue in a Federal court, since the controversy is one between citizens of different States and such a case is provided for by another part of the bill. I reply that this exception ought to be maintained because it is by no means clear that Congress has authority to confer such jurisdiction upon the courts. It is a fact that no such jurisdiction had been conferred before 1875, and it may be said with reason to sustain it that the Constitution contemplated controversies arising between citizens of different States and not those which had arisen between citizens of the same State and afterward assigned.

However that may be, Mr. Speaker, and I do not propose to go into the question, if Congress possesses the power to confer such jurisdiction it ought not to exercise it. It opens the door too wide for fraud upon the jurisdiction of the court and presents too easy a method to overload the courts and oppress the people.

The committee think that the law ought to be restored as nearly as practicable to the act of 1879.

This concludes, Mr. Speaker, what I have to say upon the changes suggested by the committee to the first section of the act of 1875 as to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts.

I now have to call the attention of the House to the changes proposed in the law regulating the removal of causes from a State to a Federal court. The committee propose to strike out that part of section 2 of the act of 1875 which reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, now pending or hereafter brought in any State court, when the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of $500, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, or in which the United States shall be plaintiff or petitioner, or when there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States, or a controversy between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under different States, or a controversy between citizens of a State and foreign States, citizens or subjects, either party may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district.

And in lieu of it to insert into section 2 the following, as shown by the bill which is now under consideration:

SEC. 2. That any suit of a civil nature, either at law or in equity, of which the circuit courts of the United States are given original jurisdiction by the last preceding section, but which may be now pending, or which may hereafter be brought in any State court, may be removed by the defendant or defendants therein to the circuit court of the United States for the proper district.

It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that the mischief intended to be remedied by the committee arises from the authority granted by the act of 1875 to either the plaintiff or defendant to remove the cause. It was the opinion of the committee, and I believe unanimous in that regard, that a plaintiff who having the right to sue in the Federal court shall have elected to bring his suit in a State court ought to be held to his election. It is often a great injustice to a defendant who has been sued in a State court to be compelled to abide the pleasure of a plaintiff who may remove the cause at any time and thus compel his adversary to employ different attorneys to represent him in a distant tribunal, and therefore the committee believe that the right to remove ought to be restricted to the defendant. It will be seen, however, that the act of 1867 is substantially retained in the bill of the committee. This act secures the right of removal to a plaintiff upon filing affidavit that he believes from prejudice or local influence he will not be able to obtain justice in such State court. Under all the circumstances which attend litigation now I believe it would be unwise to take away this right from a plaintiff, and trust it will be retained.

In this connection I desire to call attention to the amendment offered by me at the outset of my remarks. My amendment proposes as follows:

Strike out all from the word "follows," in line 47, down to the word "and" in line 54, and insert:

SEC. 2. That any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made or which shall be made under their authority of which the circuit courts of the United States are given original jurisdiction by the preceding section, which may now be pending or which may hereafter be brought in any State court, may be removed by the defendant or defendants therein to the circuit court of the United States for the proper district whenever it is made to appear from the application of such defendant or defendants that his or their defense depends in whole or in part upon a correct construction of some provision of the Constitution or law of the United States or treaty made by their authority. And any other suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, of which the circuit courts of the United States are given jurisdiction by the preceding section, and which are now pending or which may hereafter be brought in any State court, may be removed into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district by the defendant or defendants therein: Provided, Such defendant or defendants are non-residents of the State in which the suit is pending.

I think that this amendment ought to be adopted, and so much of the bill of the committee as is referred to in the amendment should be stricken out.

I submit that if the bill of the committee should become the law, any defendant will be authorized to remove a cause whether he is a resident or not of the State in which the suit is brought. I do not believe that the committee contemplated the scope to which that provision in its bill extends.

By reference to the provisions under discussion it will appear that in any suit of which the circuit court is given original jurisdiction by the bill which may be pending or hereafter brought in a State court may be removed to a Federal court "by the defendant or defendants." Suppose a citizen of Illinois sues a citizen of Texas in a State court in Texas, under the provision reported from the committee such a defendant is authorized to remove the cause. Now, the amendment which I propose obviates such results.

If the suit springs under the Constitution or the laws of the United States or treaties, &c., and is brought by the plaintiff in a State court he ought to be held to abide his election, for he might have brought his action in the circuit court of the United States. Now, a defendant in such a suit ought to be allowed to carry the case to a Federal court, provided he shall make it appear to the judges of the State court that his defense depends upon a right construction of some provision of the Constitution or a law of the United States or a treaty, &c. If his defense depends upon the application of general principles of law, and does not involve a construction of the Constitution or the laws of the United States or treaties made by their authority, he ought not to be allowed to remove the cause upon a technical allegation that his defense does so arise.

This provides for one class of cases, but the amendment I suggest goes further and provides that any other suit of which the circuit court is given jurisdiction may be removed by the defendant or defendants, provided they are non-residents of the State in which the suit is pending.

The next amendment of existing law made by the bill is as to the time when the application for removal must be made. The law now provides that the petition for the removal must be made "before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof." This clause of the law has given rise to much discussion, and there is a difference of opinion among the judges as to its true construction. In order to free the subject from doubt and to fix a rule which may be easily understood and applied, the committee recommend that the petition for removal of the cause from a State to a Federal court may be filed "at any time before the defendant is required by the laws of the State or the rule of the State court in which such suit may be brought to answer or plead to the declaration or complaint of the plaintiff." This change will commend itself to all who have observed the application of the present rule.

The next change proposed in the law is a very important one.

The committee propose to add to section 3 of the act of 1875 the following:

That the circuit courts of the United States shall not take original cognizance of any suit of a civil nature, whether at common law or in equity, between a corporation created or organized by or under the laws of any State, and a citizen of any State in which such corporation at the time the cause of action accrued may have been carrying on any business authorized by the law creating it, except in like cases in which said courts are authorized by this act to take original cognizance of suits between citizens of the same State. Nor shall any such suit between such a corporation and a citizen or citizens of a State in which it may be doing business be removed to any circuit court of the United States except in like cases in which such removal is authorized by the foregoing provisions in suits between citizens of the same State.

Mr. Speaker, I desire the Clerk to read the following extract from a late speech made by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

The Clerk read as follows:

I do not shut my eyes, Mr. President, to the fact that the equal and wholesome distribution of property which it was hoped by the founders of our Government would be attained by the abolition of the rules of primogenture, of entailments, of perpetuities, and the division of intestate estates among daughters and sons alike, has been greatly defeated. And I am inclined to believe the system of incorporation which we have introduced into all branches of industrial pursuits will be found nearly equal to the effects of primogeniture and mortmain combined in its influence upon the aggregation of wealth into a single and never-dying grasp.

Mr. CULBERSON. The effect of the amendment is simply to place such corporations upon the same plane with citizens of a State in which they carry on their business. I, for one, believe that the time has arrived when Congress should intervene in every constitutional method to protect the people against "the never-dying grasp" of associated capital, and to place a check upon the greed, rapacity, and oppression by which corporations dominate the entire business of the country.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the chairman of the committee proposes to address himself mainly to this provision, I shall omit any further observations upon it.

The final amendment proposed is embraced in the repealing clause. Besides repealing all laws in conflict with the provisions of the bill the committee recommend the repeal of section 640 of the Revised Statutes. Section 640 provides substantially that any suit commenced in any court other than a circuit court or district court of the United States against any corporation other than a banking corporation, organized under a law of the United States or against any member thereof, as such member, for any alleged liability of such corporation or of such member as a member thereof may be removed for trial in the circuit for the district where such suit is pending upon the petition of such defendant, verified by oath, stating that such defendant has a defense arising under or by virtue of the Constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States.

I do not believe that Congress has any authority to create a corporation designed to operate within a State or States; but, waiving that question, when such power is exercised by Congress the corporation so created should not be invested with rights denied a citizen. Such a corporation is not a citizen of any State, and cannot be made so by an act of Congress, yet they have extraordinary rights secured to them by the section proposed to be repealed.

I do not propose to discuss these questions, but to suggest that at the utmost all a national corporation could demand of the Government rightfully, conceding the authority on the part of Congress to create it, would be the privilege to remove a cause from a State to a United States court whenever the defense of such a corporation depended upon a correct construction of some provision of the Constitution, treaty, or law of the United States.

The courts hold that under this section the corporation can remove a cause upon a verified petition, stating that it has a defense arising under or by virtue of the Constitution, treaty, or law of the United States. There is no inquiry allowed into the truth of the allegation, either in the State court when the application is made, or Federal court after the case is transferred. It seems to be the rule of the courts to hold that when a corporation is created by an act of Congress, and such corporation is sued in a State court, any defense it may have, however trivial or susceptible it may be of adjustment upon the application of general principles of law, arises under a law of the United States. Cases are being constantly removed under this section from the State to the circuit courts of the United States and determined either in such court or in the Supreme Court finally, when in fact no provision of the Constitution, treaty, or law of the United States is necessary to be construed or even referred to in the determination of the case.

The hardship and injustice of this privilege accorded to national corporations may be observed in the daily practice of the Union Pacific and Texas Pacific Railway companies under it. I refer particularly to my own State, in which the Texas and Pacific Railway Company is operating hundreds of miles of railway, and will soon span the entire State. Every suit commenced against the company by a citizen in the State courts within the cognizance of a Federal court by amounts is removed at once upon the affidavit of a lawyer or agent of the company, stating that the defense arises under a law of Congress. In nine cases out of ten so removed no plea or answer is ever filed, except a general denial of the allegations of the plaintiff's petition; and in the trial of such causes—when tried at all—no question arises, or can arise, requiring a construction of the Constitution, treaty, or law of Congress. Why should a citizen be treated with such injustice by the law of the land? Why should a citizen be compelled to litigate a cause of action with a national corporation in a Federal court, often hundreds of miles away from his residence, when in fact no Federal element of jurisdiction enters into the controversy?

Persons who are poor and without the means to litigate with wealthy corporations are thus denied justice. They are unable to prosecute their causes, and, tired out with delays, surrender their claims for such pittance as may be offered in compromise. Besides all this, in my State at least, they have to run the peril of the arbitrary and imperious rulings of judges from whose decisions in three-fourths of the cases occurring there is no appeal.

If the amendment which I have offered to the second section should be adopted, no national corporation can complain at the repeal of section 640, because if such corporation has a meritorious defense springing or arising under the Constitution, or a treaty or a law of the United States, an ample method is provided by that amendment to remove the cause to a Federal court.

I have thus endeavored to explain the changes proposed to be made in existing law by the bill which is under consideration, and to give such reasons as occur to me for such changes.

It will be observed that the committee do not propose to interfere with causes arising under the civil-rights statutes or those relating to revenue and the elective franchise. Those, as well as criminal prosecutions, are left undisturbed.

I yield five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. WELLBORN.]

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes allowed me through the courtesy of my colleague, I want to make a hurried statement in support of so much of the last section of this bill as repeals section 640 of the Revised Statutes. While I fully indorse the whole bill and shall vote for it, I desire to speak particularly to the part indicated, because, occupying the same position as my colleague in reference to the practical administration of the law, I have been to some extent familiarized with its operation and results. These oppressive results have been for a number of years, and are to-day, keenly felt in my immediate section of country.

The provision which the bill under consideration proposes to repeal, as stated by the gentleman reporting this bill, is a substantial if not a liberal re-enactment of the act of July 27, 1868. It provides that any Federal corporation, any corporation other than a banking association, organized under the laws of the United States, against which suit has been brought in any court other than a circuit or district court of the United States, shall be allowed to remove such suit into the circuit court of the district in which the suit is pending, on filing its petition verified by oath, stating that the corporation has a defense arising under the Constitution or some law or treaty of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is claimed that in every suit against a Federal corporation it necessarily has a defense arising under, because chartered by, a law of the United States, and therefore that all suits against these corporations are removable under this section 640. Nor is the claim unsupported by authority. As has already been indicated by my colleague, the Supreme Court of the United States as far back as 1824, through Chief-Justice Marshall, enunciated and applied the general principle that a Federal corporation could in no instance have a case for judicial cognizance which did not arise literally as well as substantially under the law of its creation. Fifty years later, in the eighth circuit, Judge Miller, construing this very law of 1868, sustained the right of removal upon this same general principle. Other eminent jurists, without undertaking to determine the question, pronounce it to be a close one. What authoritative construction the Supreme Court will ultimately place upon the law is of course a mere matter of conjecture.

So we are confronted with this state of things: a Federal corporation probably—not to use a stronger word—probably can remove at its option from a State court into a Federal court for trial any suit commenced against it in the former, no matter what may be the character of the litigation, no matter what may be the issues which it really presents for adjudication, and no matter whether or not any of those issues involve the construction of the Constitution or any law or treaty of the United States. This unrestricted right of removal, so convenient and valuable to these corporations, so onerous, so hurtful to the general public with whom they deal, constitutes one of the most striking anomalies, most flagrant solecisms in our whole judicial system, and was, as reference to the debates in the Senate of the Fortieth Congress will show, conceived in the interest of those corporations which under different titles of Pacific railroads have constructed and are now operating our lines of transcontinental railway.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we consider the great length of these lines of road, the immense extent of territory they traverse, the innumerable thousands of people with whom they come in contact and have business relations, the widespread wrong and injustice of this law must become obvious to the commonest understanding. All causes of complaint, all grounds of defense, whether they in point of fact involve or not a construction of a law of the United States, can probably be removed into the Federal courts.

Let me illustrate. Has one of these companies entered upon the land and appropriated the timber or other property of a citizen living adjacent to its line, or has it undertaken the transportation of freight and failed to deliver it in accordance with the contract, or has it through badly constructed road-bed or defective machinery or negligence of employés inflicted injury upon the person of a passenger to whom it owed the duty of safe carriage, and has the injured party appealed to the local courts of his own State for indemnity or reparation, in either and all of these cases the corporation has but to file its petition for removal and the controversy is at once transferred to another forum, in many instances far remote from the scene of the injury and the homes of witnesses, where the increased cost of litigation and protracted delays ultimately but surely force upon the suffering and needy suitor an unwilling abandonment of his rights.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield five minutes more to my colleague.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, there is, indeed there can be, but one conclusion from these stated cases, and while they may be hypothetical yet they are such as are constantly occurring in practice.

I have witnessed them, and every gentleman on this floor from the State of Texas has witnessed personally the practical operation and the result of this law.

I submit, sir, from these cases, which I have presented for the purpose of argument, and which are drawn from actual experience, there can be but one conclusion on this subject, and that is that the practical administration of this law of 1868, which this bill proposes to repeal, is in many instances an absolute denial of justice, and a denial of justice of the most objectionable and odious character because in the interest of the wealthy and powerful corporations that need no such protective privileges, and to the manifest detriment and injury of those citizens whose limited circumstances appeal loudest for security and protection.

I simply desire to say, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, that in presenting this contract between corporations so largely benefited by the act of 1868 and the citizen who is damaged by its operations I have no words of unmerited reproach, no noisy declamation to level against these corporations, with a view of playing upon real or imagined chords of popular prejudice. On the contrary, I fully recognize the large benefits their energies and labors have scattered throughout the land, and pay willing tribute to the good they have accomplished. It is right and truthful to do so. Their trunk lines have crossed and are still crossing our continent, bringing into rapid and close connection its widely separated oceans. The prosecution and completion of these great works have contributed largely to the advancement through and establishment within the bosom of the recently undeveloped but now mighty West of an enduring civilization, whose material productions will yet swell to incalculable proportions the volume of our country's commerce, and under whose continuing benefactions multiplied millions of this and coming ages will live and prosper. While truth and fairness freely allow the recognition and acknowledgment of these beneficent results, right and justice, with sterner emphasis, prohibit the perpetuation of all such vicious privileges as the one this bill proposes to abolish.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I propose to say, in conclusion, that this bill does not interfere with civil rights, nor does it propose to interfere in any manner with criminal prosecutions.

Mr. NEW. Nor with the elective franchise.

Mr. CULBERSON. Nor does it interfere with the elective franchise.

We have avoided these topics because we are satisfied in the temper which controls legislation here it would be impossible to modify or correct those statutes. We say, therefore, only that section 640 should be repealed, and that domestic corporations should be abridged in the rights they now claim, and that the minimum jurisdiction of the circuit courts should be raised from five hundred to two thousand dollars exclusive of costs and interest.

Mr. WILLITS. Mr. Speaker, in the main, I support this bill heartily. It has for its practical object the decrease of business in United States courts, the amount of business in those courts having for years been a crying evil to suitors.

Secondarily, there are amendments which affect the general judiciary system. Two radical amendments are proposed. The bill proposes to amend four sections of the act of March 3, 1875, which itself was an amendment of the act of 1789, the original judiciary act. The groundwork of our judiciary system to-day may be found in the act of the 24th of September, 1789. Subsequent acts have simply expanded that act under the clause of the Constitution by which persons may sue for their rights.

The two radical amendments are to be found in the first and in the last section. The first one is the clause changing the amount requisite for bringing suits in United States circuit courts from $500 to $2,000. The original jurisdiction of the circuit court therefore in private cases will be $2,000. Section 2 provides for removal of causes from State courts to United States circuit courts, under a similar limitation of $2,000.

The second radical amendment may be found at the bottom of page 6, and it is substantially as follows: That a corporation organized by a State, doing business in another State, shall, so far as the purposes of this act are concerned, be citizens of the State in which it is doing business.

Now, sir, I propose briefly to state the minor amendments and briefly to comment upon the two radical amendments to which I have just referred. The committee thought it advisable to increase the amount requisite for original jurisdiction in the United States court from five hundred to two thousand dollars, and the considerations presented to them are in substance as follows: Five hundred dollars has been the amount requisite ever since the act of 1789. It is the law to-day. Two thousand dollars is no more now in the commercial world in business transactions than $500 was in 1789.

Mr. BAKER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question if he will permit me to interrupt him at this point.

Mr. WILLITS. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER. And that is whether or not the same difficulty will not be experienced under the first section, fixing the jurisdiction at $2,000, that is now experienced with the jurisdiction fixed at $500, namely, that parties really having causes of action which do not amount to more than five or ten or twenty dollars, will allege that the amount in controversy is $500 or more, and thus get it into the Federal court, and the only remedy the defendant has is simply the claimant shall not recover anything in addition to the debt. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether there ought not to be a remedy in that regard to prevent what I apprehend he has seen, as I have, is a most monstrous abuse of these courts, making them a drag-net for all sorts of litigation that the parties do not dare to bring suit upon at their homes where the parties live, and which they prefer rather to pay in order to prevent being drawn to a distant Federal court, whether the demand be right or wrong?

Mr. WILLITS. This bill does not propose to change the law in that regard. That subject was before the committee and discussed to a certain extent. Notwithstanding what the gentleman has said about the existing evil we do not find it such an existing evil as required a radical change of the law in that regard. There are isolated cases where that thing has been done, where the declaration as filed and the amount claimed governs. Nevertheless we find as a matter of fact as an evil that that is substantially obviated by the fact that they do not recover costs. In other words that it is not such a crying evil as demanded a change in the law, and we sought not to make any changes which we did not consider radical.

Mr. BAKER. If the gentleman will yield to me for a single moment, I desire to say I shall offer an amendment at the proper time to remedy the evil that I complain of. My own observation convinces me that this is practically an evil of the most atrocious character, that it is one of the greatest evils growing out of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. It is within my own personal observation that multitudes of little claims not exceeding $20 have been instituted against constituents of mine, who rather than be dragged before the Federal courts, with all of the expense and annoyance attending it, have consented to their settlement.

Mr. WILLITS. Were the claims on contracts?

Mr. BAKER. Claims on ordinary contracts. I have in my mind's eye a case where more than a thousand citizens of Indiana were sued on contracts of twenty or twenty-five dollars they had entered into with a foreign mutual insurance company.

Mr. WILLITS. I admit that such cases have arisen, but it is of course for the consideration of this House as to whether it will amend this bill in that regard or not, but the Committee on the Judiciary did not feel warranted from the knowledge they had before them to change the law as has been suggested by the gentleman from Indiana.

As I was saying at the time I was interrupted by the gentleman from Indiana, $2,000 to-day is in fact no more than $500 was at the time this law of 1789 was enacted. The mere fact that we increase the amount from $500 to $2,000 may not of itself obviate the evasion suggested.

It is manifest that this very clause itself will prevent a large flow of cases to the United States courts, and necessarily they must be brought in the State courts, and in so far as they do that the courts of the United States will be relieved of the pressing business upon their calendars to-day.

This bill has made no essential change in the first section, so far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned, except to enlarge the amount from five hundred to two thousand dollars. Under this bill, as under the law of 1875, the United States may sue in the circuit courts for any sums. The United States is not limited to $2,000.

From the thirty-sixth to the thirty-ninth lines of the bill there is an amendment as follows:

And where the controversy is between citizens of different States, suits shall be brought only in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant.

The rest of the section preceding that that I have read is substantially, except in regard, as I have stated, to the amount, the same as the law of 1875. From lines 39 to 43 a change or modification has been made by this bill. It restores actions in reference to assigned contracts to substantially the same status as was enacted in 1789, which will be found incorporated in the Revised Statutes of the United States, the first clause of section 629.

The laws of 1875 made this important change as an exception, as follows:

Nor shall any circuit or district court have cognizance of any suit founded on contract in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover thereon if no assignment had been made, except in cases of promissory notes negotiable by a law merchant or bills of exchange.

The words "promissory notes negotiable by law merchant" were added by that act.

The committee, after looking the ground all over, seeing the great evils that have arisen from the incorporation of this clause, recommend by this bill the striking of that out; so that the act will be substantially the act of 1789 in this regard.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBINSON. I make the point of order that the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois.) The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLACKBURN rose.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to me for a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield to the gentleman to make that motion.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the joint resolution (H. R. No. 170) concerning an international fishery exhibition to be held in Berlin, Germany, in April, 1880.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is only competent for the gentleman from New York to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole. If his motion is agreed to it will be for the Committee of the Whole to determine what bill shall be taken up for consideration.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. For what purpose does the gentleman desire the House to go into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MORTON. To consider the joint resolution relating to the international fishery exhibition at Berlin.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the bills upon the Calendar must be taken up and disposed of in their order. The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that all bills standing upon the Calendar in advance of the measure indicated by the gentleman from New York shall be considered as having been passed over and that the Clerk shall report the measure indicated by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Let the measure be reported first. Until it is reported I reserve the right to object to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The Clerk read the joint resolution (H. R. No. 170) concerning an international fishery exhibition to be held in Berlin, Germany, in April, 1880.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution which has been read shall now be considered. All prior business on the Calendar being passed over for that purpose. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is it proposed to consider the joint resolution now and dispose of it?

Mr. MORTON. That is what I ask. I think this will occupy the committee for only a very short period. I desire to make a very few remarks myself and a few remarks will also be submitted by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER] who submitted the joint resolution.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is it proposed to go into general debate? If so, much time may be consumed.

Mr. MORTON. I think it will not take beyond thirty minutes, perhaps not over twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that by unanimous consent prior business on the Calendar be passed over?

Mr. WISE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Clerk will have to report the bills as they stand on the Calendar.

The Clerk read the title of the first bill on the Calendar, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 440) for the ascertainment of the amount due the Choctaw Nation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that that bill be passed over.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next business on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts.

Mr. MORTON. I move that that bill be passed over.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next business on the Calendar.

The Clerk read the following resolution, reported by Mr. MURCH, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into all matters pertaining to the preparation and furnishing of all material for the construction of public buildings, and the manner of constructing the public buildings of the United States under the different systems adopted by the Government of the United States, and to report to this House, by bill or otherwise, what legislation is necessary to secure good material and good and suitable work at fair and reasonable compensation to the mechanics and workmen employed on public works; and said committee are further instructed to inquire into all expenses pertaining to the erection of the public buildings of the United States, and to make all such further inquiries as they may deem proper. And said committee are authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths. And said committee are further authorized to employ a stenographer at a fair compensation. And said committee are authorized to appoint a sub-committee of its own members for the purpose of pursuing these investigations; said committee, when appointed, to have all the powers conferred by this resolution. And said committee, or its sub-committee, may make their investigations either at the city of Washington or at any of the cities or other places where public buildings are being erected or material prepared, as they may deem proper. And said committee, or its sub-committee, may sit during the sessions or recesses of Congress. And the expenses attending the carrying out of these investigations shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, not to exceed $5,000; and the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed to pay the same.

Mr. MORTON. I move that that be passed over.

Mr. MURCH. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. It can be controlled by a majority vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORTON.] It is perfectly manifest that a large majority—probably nine-tenths—of the members of this House are in favor of this measure, but if gentlemen object to laying aside prior business on the Calendar and make an objection in reference to each bill, I think this may as well be given up till Monday, when the gentleman from New York will have it in his power to move to suspend the rules. I dislike very much to see the measure delayed, but I am satisfied it would take two hours to reach it at this rate.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to say that this important subject has been considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the joint resolution is the unanimous report of that committee.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. This is only proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MURCH. I withdraw the objection to pass over the resolution last reported.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that we proceed at once to the joint resolution which the gentleman from New York desires to reach.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will withdraw his objection.

Mr. STEELE. Indeed I will not.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is simply a useless consumption of time.

Mr. STEELE. I do not withdraw the objection, and it is useless for you to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next business on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 2265) to direct the Architect of the Capitol to move the bath-room, for the enlargement of the House restaurant.

Mr. MORTON. I move that that bill be passed over.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next business on the Calendar.

The Clerk read the following resolution, reported by Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, from the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ, until otherwise ordered by the House, in addition to the force in his office now authorized by law, one clerk at $1,800 per annum and one messenger at $1,600 per annum; said messenger to assist in preserving order on the floor of the House in the absence of the Sergeant-at-Arms, to serve subpœnas, and to perform such other duties as may be assigned to him; and the salaries herein ordered shall be paid monthly out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. MORTON. I move that that resolution be passed over.

The motion was agreed to.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2268) to authorize the sale of certain property in the city of New York.

Mr. MORTON moved that the bill be laid aside.

The motion was agreed to.

The next business on the Calendar was the following resolution, submitted by Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That the sub-committee of the Committee on Commerce, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted on the 4th instant on the subject of the commercial relations of the country, and who are authorized to inquire by what means our foreign trade may be best promoted and foreign markets opened to American products and manufactures, have leave to sit at such times and places as shall seem to them expedient during the recess of Congress, to administer oaths and take testimony, to employ a clerk and stenographer at a fair compensation; and for the purposes aforesaid the sum of $2,500 be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, for the use of said committee, on the requisition of the chairman, whose receipt shall be a good and sufficient voucher therefor.

Mr. BLOUNT. In view of what is passing now it is evident that it is simply a question of the saving of time. I ask unanimous consent that the committee proceed immediately to the consideration of the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORTON.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will consent to that if the gentleman will modify his proposition so that the joint resolution may be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORTON] will agree to that.

Mr. MORTON. I will consent to that.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

INTERNATIONAL FISHERY EXHIBITION.

The committee accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 170) concerning an international fishery exhibition to be held in Berlin, Germany, in April, 1880, introduced by Mr. DEUSTER and reported, with amendments, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs by Mr. MORTON.

Mr. MORTON. I ask that the joint resolution be read as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas all civilized nations take part in the international fishery exhibition to be held in the city of Berlin, Germany, in April, 1880, it is deemed both right and expedient that the prominent and effective action of the United States in the line of the artificial propagation of fish and the stocking of depleted fishing waters should be conspicuously and well exhibited on the occasion: Therefore,

Resolved, &c., That to enable the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries to exhibit America in Berlin in April, 1880, a fair and full collection of the different specimens of American food-fishes, casts thereof, models of, and implements, &c., used in the prosecution of American fisheries, the sum of $20,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated in the Treasury of the United States, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose, to be immediately available on the passage of this resolution.

SEC. 2. That the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries be, and is hereby, authorized to represent the United States, either in person or by a deputy to be appointed by the President of the United States; and that, at his discretion, he may use any portion of the collections at present forming part of the National Museum in making up the proposed exhibition by the United States.

SEC. 3. That the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries be, and is hereby, instructed to present to Congress through the Department of State a report upon the Berlin Exhibition, showing the recent progress and present condition of the fisheries and of fish culture in foreign countries.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Chairman, at first glance a proposition to expend money on an international fishery exhibition at Berlin is likely to be viewed with indifference. This indifference to our fisheries and to these exhibitions has existed for years, and was never more manifest than now.

The production of fish is a source of national wealth, and in the early history of the world it was a preventive of famine and distress. Experience has shown that while it is a luxury of the rich it is preeminently the poor man's food. This is understood thoroughly in the countries where food production and cheap living are carried to the greatest perfection. It is estimated that about forty-five millions of Chinese subsist almost entirely on fish.

But it is not merely inland fisheries that are of importance to the poor. The sea fisheries are hardly less so. If properly developed, the price of fish would be so much lowered that the man who could not buy would be rare indeed, and so little capital is necessary for the business that there would be sufficient profit left to those who carried it on.

Other countries do not look upon fisheries as we do. One of these international exhibitions was held at Bergen, Norway, in 1865, at which the fish of all the great countries and many of the lesser ones were well represented. Insignificant Bavaria sent 69 contributions; Great Britain, 174; Sweden, 368; and Holland, 435. How many came from this country? One! Another exhibition was held in France in 1866, and our fish were not presented at all.

The French government has given so much material aid to this business of fish culture that nearly all her waste waters have been turned into nests for the propagation of fish. One of the earliest and most extensive establishments for the culture of fish is that erected by France at Huningen, which went into operation in 1852, and in six months had artificially fecundated three million eggs and produced 1,600,000 living fish.

It is only necessary to call the attention of the public to the subject for it to appear that there is not a State which is not interested in the matter.

Mr. Chairman, not many years ago the vast internal improvements of this country—the erection of mills, dams, and factories—threatened the extinction of the most valuable species of fish in our rivers. This calamity was prevented by the timely discovery of the art of propagating fish by artifical means, and at the same time the demand was greatly increased through the aid of railroads which have made transportation easy between remote points in a brief time.

In 1840-'50 salmon cost twenty times the price it commanded when we ceased to be colonies of Great Britain. The Connecticut River, which had been one of the most fertile fish streams in the world, became almost depleted. Few, however, understand the methods of replenishing our waters from which the most valuable species of fish have been banished. This result is due to a discovery made in Germany, and afterward in France, that fish can be propagated to almost any extent by artificial means. This simple fact has led to the creation of one of the most important industries of modern times. The nations of the world have derived incalculable benefit from this discovery, and we are now invited to join in an international comparison of the character of our fish and the methods of our fish culture. It is to this science to which I have referred, and which this resolution is designed to encourage and extend, that we owe the restocking of our waters; to this we owe the fact that millions of young shad were hatched at Holyoke, Massachusetts, and turned into the Connecticut River.

In view of the possibilities of our shores, our measureless streams, and our inland seas, we should lead all nations in the world in availing ourselves of every item of information on a subject of such importance to our people and their industries. The annual value of salmon alone in Ireland is now about $2,500,000, while in this country it averages from thirty to forty cents a pound. The oyster-beds in Virginia alone cover an area of about seventeen hundred thousand acres, containing about eight hundred millions of bushels. The following are a few figures showing the comparative production and consumption of fish by the leading nations of the world:

Countries.	Annual product.	Annual consumption.
Norway	$13,600,000	$1,000,000
France	12,807,000	9,845,786
United States	8,898,000	8,777,000
Great Britain	7,803,800	9,429,000
Russia	5,745,000	8,659,000

The United States exported in 1874 about twenty-two hundred thousand dollars' worth.

It appears from this statement that in 1874 Norway and France, each smaller than some of our States, produced respectively one-third more fish than the United States. In 1862 the tonnage of American ships engaged in the sea-fisheries amounted to 204,197, in 1874 it had fallen to 78,290 tons.

In the report of the United States Fish Commissioner for 1877 there is a description of a fish of most excellent quality found on the American coast. It existed in great numbers, and yet was unknown to our fishermen—for the reason that they were not acquainted with the apparatus of European fishermen. This should teach us how important it is for us to be familiar with those improvements and methods which prevail in the Old World.

In the fish trade in 1865 Norway had a balance of trade in her favor of $12,588,975. Why was this? Because she resorted to fish production as it is proposed the United States should do. In this connection the United States Fish Commissioner again says:

> Norway is the only European nation that has a scientific commission occupied officially in the supervision of the fisheries, and in devising methods by which they may be carried on and extended with the least possible waste. To the labors and observation of such men as Dr. Boeck, Professor Sars, and others, is due much of the present efficiency of the Norwegian fisheries.

In 1867 we imported about as much fish as we exported. If we devoted sufficient energy to the business we could export one hundred times as much, and need import none at all.

I will leave the subject of fish culture with a single quotation from the Connecticut fisheries report for 1871. This is the substance:

> At the expense of a few hundred dollars shad were artificially hatched and returned to the Connecticut River by Seth Green, one of the pioneers of American fish culture. In three years, the time required for shad to mature, these fish had become more abundant in the river than they were before the white man began to fish them out.

Fish culture is in its infancy. Its resources are immeasurable. It may approximate and even rival agriculture in importance. Its development will give employment to large numbers of men and bring food within the means of the poor as well as of the rich. The propriety and utility of international exhibitions, where the representatives of our nation can learn the nature of the products of the others as well as show its own in a universal market, can no longer be questioned.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are direct advantages to be derived from this international conference. The naturalization in our waters of European fish is a subject that should receive careful attention, and by a comparison of views in this body of scientific men much may be learned as to the nature and kinds of foreign fish which thrive in our waters. In many of our States legislation has been effected establishing means for the protection and preservation of fish, and in many cases concurrent action has been taken among States bordering upon the same stream. What the States can do has therefore in some measure been done. It is the duty of the General Government to supplement their works by a representation at international exhibitions and conferences.

This international exhibition is conducted directly under the patronage of the German government by the German Fishery Association, a body consisting of prominent persons most eminent in fish culture and the fisheries. Almost every nation in the world having diplomatic relations with Germany has accepted the invitation, exceptionally complete exhibitions being promised by China, Japan, and Siam. The United States alone has given no response nor made arrangements to participate. As a matter of international comity it would seem eminently proper for the United States to take part. The fishery exhibit at Philadelphia in which the United States participated was the best and the most successful of all recent international displays. If the invitation of the German government is to be accepted no time is to be lost; even now a complete exhibition will only be practicable by the exercise of great effort.

Mr. Chairman, I now call attention to some of the results which have been achieved by the United States Fish Commission since its creation in 1872, in respect to which it is safe to assert that the United States is in advance of foreign nations in the methods and machinery of the fisheries; in the use of better equipped vessels, some steam and some under sail, a large fleet being now employed continually on the coast and off the coast; in the use of greatly improved means of taking fish, especially the replacing of the hook and line by means of labor-saving nets, and particularly by the purse-seine, by which a thousand barrels of fish are frequently taken at one haul, instead of depending upon the capture of the fish one at a time.

In catching mackerel the United States first used a line with a baited hook dragged along the surface of the water, the vessel being under sail. Sometimes the baited hook was sent below the surface, the vessel being either under gentle sail or anchored. Here only such fish were taken as happened to be in the vicinity of the vessel. Next, the vessel was anchored or hove to, and the mackerel brought up to the boat by means of a lure consisting of finely-chopped fish, thrown overboard, thus attracting the schools from a distance sometimes of several miles. Next, seines or nets of various forms of construction were introduced, and last of all the purse-seines for fishing in deep water were employed, which surrounded the fish and captured an entire school at one operation. The use of similar seines in connection with specially constructed steamers, in the capture of the moss bunker or menhaden and the conversion of the fish into valuable oil and manure in costly establishments, either floating or on shore, is peculiar to the United States.

Another peculiar American feature in the capture of sea fish is the use of the so-called dory, a boat from sixteen to twenty-two feet in length, and much lighter and more secure at sea and superior in every way to any boat used in Europe. Applications are being constantly received by the Commissioner for models, drawings, and descriptions of this boat.

The original methods of fish culture consisted in allowing the natural current of water, as that from a spring or hydrant, to pass through wooden troughs, having on the bottom a layer of gravel, among which the eggs were placed; this essentially represents to this day the inventive genius of Europe. The next mode was in anchoring the trawls in a river so as to get the natural flow of the water instead of depending upon springs or hydrants. This, as at first applied by Seth Green, rendered the hatching of shad practicable on a large scale.

Again, advancing on its own method of having the eggs in actual layers and trays, the United States devised the method of placing the eggs in large vessels of a conical shape, and allowing the water to come in at the bottom and flow over at the top, by which means enormous numbers can be hatched on a given area. Such is the apparatus used to a considerable extent by the United States at its salmon-hatching establishments in Maine and California. As the result, with a very small force of operatives, as many as fifteen millions of eggs have been treated in a single season on the Sacramento River hatchery—a product much more than that of all the salmon-hatching establishments, public and private, in Europe combined.

The funnel apparatus was next placed by the United States commission on floating scows, so that the water used in developing the eggs could be drawn directly from the subjacent river where they were anchored. With this was combined a form of buckets filled with eggs and plunged up and down in the water continually by means of steam power. The success of the method of the use of scows led to the construction of a large steamer especially fitted for this purpose and nearly ready for use, by which the amount of work of previous seasons can be increased many fold.

The efforts of Europe in the artificial propagation of fish have been confined chiefly to the treatment of different species of salmon, trout, and whitefish, and this by the rude methods first indicated—all breeding in fresh water. The United States Fish Commission first conceived the idea and made the experiments of artificial impregnation of and hatching the eggs of the various sea fishes, which require a totally different treatment from the eggs of fresh-water species, the latter sinking to the bottom of the water, while the former float on the surface. Experiments were prosecuted in the harbor of Gloucester in the hatching of eggs of the cod, during the winters of 1878–'79, which, after many failures, resulted in entire success. The steamer referred to is an essential factor in the work contemplated for the future, being capable of producing hundreds of millions of young fish in a single season.

The hatching of cod, mackerel, halibut, sea-herring, and indeed any of the fish of our coast, with the exception of the bluefish and menhaden, (which do not spawn at a time when they can be reached,) becomes perfectly practicable. Not only can the old off-shore and other grounds be increased in their productiveness, but new stations can be established. It is especially anticipated that productive cod fisheries can be developed as far south as the Chesapeake Bay or even Cape Hatteras, thus giving lucrative occupation to a large class of the community in the winter season, when the cod would be on the coast and when other fishing would be intermitted. The benefit to the people of the South in this increase of a supply of cheap fish-food during the winter will of course be readily appreciated. The fitful appearance and disappearance of mackerel on the American coast can also, in a great measure, be regulated.

It is hoped to transfer the general seat of the cod and of the mackerel fisheries from the distant banks and the Gulf of St. Lawrence to the coast of the United States, thus settling some very serious internation fishery questions, and making the American codfisheries especially similar to those of Norway, where twenty-five thousand men are employed for four months of the year in fishing in open boats, going out in the morning and returning at night.

The European nations, especially the Germans and Norwegians, have been kept advised of the success of the United States Fish Commission in the hatching of various species of sea fishes, through the public papers, but no reports of the commission have appeared later than that for 1877; they are without the detailed information desired, most of the discoveries having been made in 1878 and 1879.

European nations are aware that all the more recent improvements in the hatching of fish, both fresh-water and marine, have been developed by the United States Commission, and especially by Mr. T. B. Ferguson, the assistant commissioner. The agents of the North German Lloyd's have offered to carry the exhibits of the United States at half rates, and have asked permission of the director of the company in Bremen to take them free of any expense whatever.

These results show the advantages which have already accrued from the action of Congress in enabling this country to profit by the discoveries and experiences of European nations in the culture of fish.

I wish to express my thanks to Professor Baird, the distinguished scientist, for valuable information as to the work which has been accomplished by the United States Fish Commission, of which he has been the head since its creation in 1872.

I cannot close my remarks, Mr. Chairman, without expressing the opinion that the country owes a debt of gratitude, the magnitude of which may not be appreciated to-day, to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who in 1872 introduced the bill providing for the creation of the United States Fish Commission, and by his earnest personal efforts secured its passage.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell at the expiration of five minutes.]

Mr. MCKINLEY obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. MORTON, who concluded his remarks as above.

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask indulgence but for a few moments while offering some explanatory remarks in regard to the resolution introduced by me, and now under consideration.

At the "international fishery exhibition," to be held at Berlin in April, every civilized country will be represented, and even China and Japan will claim their share of the world's attention in the progress made by them. Among those to whom the management of the exhibition has been confided we find the names of men of science well known throughout the civilized world. The scope of the exhibition is not limited to the direct results and products of fish propagation, but embraces all that is in any way connected with this important branch of human industry, such as models, casts, and other representations of appliances in use in pisciculture, in transportation, preparation, or preservation of products of fisheries for commercial or domestic purposes, fishing implements—in short, everything that will represent modern progress in this respect.

Nothing has been done thus far to secure a participation on the part of the United States in this exhibition; yet there is no country which would be better entitled to the place of honor at such an exhibition than our own. No country in the world can display the evidence of such marvelous activity and progress in the propagation and distribution of food-fishes by artificial means as the United States. During the short period which has passed since our first efforts in this direction were made, in 1871, more has been accomplished in this country than even in Europe which had the experience of decades to aid in the efforts made there. We need but glance over the results reported by the United States Fish Commission since 1872 to satisfy ourselves that while the task attempted has been very great the results accomplished have been most eminent. Without desire to take up much time, I will point out but a few of those results of which we may justly be proud and which will go to show that our progress in this respect is well calculated to gain for our great natural resources and advantages, as well as our skill in using and improving them, the admiration of the Old World at such an exhibition.

One of the first efforts made by the United States Fish Commission toward improving our greatly reduced supply of food-fishes consisted in the restocking of our waters with salmon and salmon-trout. Not only did the Fish Commissioner succeed by transplanting western species of this valuable fish to eastern waters and eastern species to western waters in enriching both, but the propagation of this fish by artificial means has been so extensive and successful that the present market price of the salmon, one of the best food-fishes in the United States, is from 10 to 15 per cent. lower than before propagation was attempted.

Another excellent result we are able to display in our experiments with the codfish. Until two years ago it was considered a hopeless task to propagate artificially the codfish, which, as is well known, is one of the main sources of income and support of a large part of the population of our Northeastern States. But while numerous experiments failed the artificial hatching of this fish was at last accomplished with comparatively small cost and such gratifying results that the harvest to be gathered from our well-supplied waters will repay the cost incurred a hundred-fold.

In the propagation of the shad we have achieved another great success to which we can point with pride. This excellent and well-appreciated food-fish had almost vanished from the impoverished waters of our Northern, Middle, and Southern States, but the efforts made in restocking them have been so well rewarded that, where two years ago not a single fish was to be found, the fisherman can now draw his seine well assured of a rich harvest.

But one of the most interesting results of our experiments and successes in the propagation of fish is that which we can show in the carp, a fish unsurpassed for delicacy of flavor, and destined to become very popular with our people as well as remunerative to them. A few years since a limited number of carps were imported, and the efforts made to propagate this fish artificially have been so successful that by this time their offspring are distributed not only along the Atlantic coast, but over the whole country to the Pacific. Heretofore an entire stranger to our waters, the carp has become Americanized with wonderful rapidity. I am informed that the carps hatched here last summer in the ponds near the Washington Monument have already attained an average weight of two and a half pounds, and that they have been fed simply upon boiled Indian corn. There is a highly important suggestion embodied in this fact which may prove of incalculable benefit to the country at large. It goes to show that even a farmer far distant from river or stream can, by an easy process, convert his surplus of corn into a most wholesome, profitable, and marketable food in the shape of carp.

There are other interesting facts connected with the transplanting of this fish into American waters from Germany and Austria, of which the carp is a native. This fish was a gift obtained from those countries, a gift cheerfully offered by the respective governments, a gift which we have turned to good account, made valuable and remunerative, and which, in due time, will become a factor of wealth of no little significance in our national economy. This alone should induce us to improve the opportunity offered for displaying the important and astonishing results obtained, and our success in this single instance alone would justify us in incurring the trifling expense connected with such an exhibition. We can show to the world that, as in other respects, in this enterprise, too, we have accomplished all we have undertaken to do, and even more.

Every consideration of national pride prompts us to assume without delay the place of prominence and foremost rank we can so justly claim in this international exhibition of modern progress. There has been no important exhibition held yet during the past few decades of progress, and in which we participated, that has not resulted immeasurably to our benefit. Invariably our markets were multiplied either for the implements, tools, and other means of producing merchantable articles, or for the products themselves. At the same time we have profited by the experience of others, and, with the practical sense peculiar to our people, found new ways of adapting old methods and practices.

Nor have our successes in regard to pisciculture remained unnoticed abroad, as has been frequently attested by the many references to our efforts in foreign scientific publications, and as a natural consequence great interest has been awakened in Europe in our experiments and efforts in this respect. An exhibition of their gratifying results, therefore, can only be of great benefit to us.

As there is but a very short space of time left for preparation, it has been necessary, I regret to say, to bring this measure to the attention of Congress in the shortest time possible; but I trust, nevertheless, that the report of the committee will be unanimously adopted.

[During the remarks of Mr. DEUSTER the hammer fell at the expiration of five minutes.]

Mr. SCALES obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. DEUSTER, who concluded his remarks, as above.

Mr. STEELE. I move to amend the joint resolution by striking out the word "fishery" and inserting the word "fish;" or, if gentlemen prefer it, I will move to strike out the last two syllables of the word "fishery." [Laughter.]

As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, it will be a somewhat difficult matter, with a meager appropriation of $20,000, to transport an American fishery over to Berlin, in Prussia. Fishery is a place where they catch fish; that is what I understand by it, and I have just consulted Webster. [Laughter.]

It does strike me that the proposition now pending before the Congress of the United States is of not such tremendous importance as the speeches of the two gentlemen who have just debated it would seem to indicate. Among other things, the joint resolution proposes to appropriate $20,000 for the purpose of sending over to Berlin a specimen of the fish-hooks used in this country. That would include the old-fashioned pin-hook, which, as I understand, is in common use to this day in the Springfield district of the State of Illinois. [Laughter.]

Now, if it were confined to steel hooks, whether of the old Limerick or the Kirby persuasion, I should not think it a matter of very material importance. But to send over there a specimen of all the fish-hooks used in this country——

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEELE. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. ROBESON. Does the gentleman think that a pin-hook would hold a fish of the "Springer" species? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. I think it would, if you jerk him out quick, though I confess I think it would ordinarily be well to have a pretty heavy barb to the hook.

I think in all earnestness (and I am in earnest in every word I have uttered, everybody knows that) that it is absolutely ridiculous to be appropriating a sum of money for the purpose of sending specimens of food-fish from American waters to Europe. Everybody over there who knows anything about it knows that this country absolutely teems with food-fish, from suckers all the way up to catfish. [Renewed laughter.] I am opposed to the whole business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by unanimous consent, when the House went into Committee of the Whole, for the discussion of this matter has been exhausted.

Mr. ROBESON. I want to say one word in the agricultural interest.

Mr. GARFIELD. Vote down the amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. STEELE to strike out "fishery" and insert "fish;" and it was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I offer an amendment which I understand is acceptable to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MORTON. I am willing that it should be made.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move to amend the first section of the bill, making the appropriation of $20,000, by adding to it the words "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State."

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to say only a few words upon the subject-matter of this joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] can proceed only by unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBESON. This subject of fish-culture has within the last ten years grown into great importance in this country. All our rivers flowing to the ocean have been stocked with their native fish and new supplies of food for the people who live upon their banks are being provided through that machinery. But that does not reach all the necessities of our country. The United States Fish Commission, in pursuance of a wise policy, has endeavored to introduce fish that may be said to be inland fish; fish that can be raised by the farmer wherever he has a little pond or a little lake on his property or near it. Those fish are raised principally in Germany and in that section where is to be specially represented the advance of fish-culture at this exhibition. The species of fish to which I refer is the carp. The raising of the carp is one of the principal objects for which this commission is organized and this appropriation made. The introduction of the carp into this country is very important. It is a species of fish that does not require running water or cold water; it can be raised in every little pond—in almost every ditch in the country. It is fed on Indian meal. It grows to two pounds weight in two years. When this fish is fully introduced into this country every farmer (and I now speak in behalf of the agricultural interests) can have fresh fish and brain food for breakfast every morning.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROTHWELL. Have not these fish been already introduced in this country?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORTON] on behalf of the committee. It will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

SEC. 2. That the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries be, and is hereby, authorized to represent the United States, either in person or by a deputy to be appointed by the President of the United States; and that, at his discretion, he may use any portion of the collections at present forming part of the National Museum in making up the proposed exhibition by the United States.

SEC. 3. That the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries be, and is hereby, instructed to present to Congress, through the Department of State, a report upon the Berlin exhibition, showing the recent progress and present condition of the fisheries and of fish-culture in foreign countries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN VOORHIS,] to add to the first section the words "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State."

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by striking out "twenty" and inserting "ten," so as to make the amount of this appropriation $10,000. I think that will be sufficient.

Mr. WILSON. On that subject I desire to make one remark.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted, the time limited by order of the House having expired.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ATKINS, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 52, noes 78.

Mr. McMILLIN. I give notice that on this amendment I shall demand the yeas and nays in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman will not have that right, as an amendment not agreed to in the Committee of the Whole is not reported to the House.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the committee rise and report to the House the joint resolution as amended, with the recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole, having had under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 170) concerning an international fishery exhibition to be held in Berlin, Germany, in April, 1880, had directed him to report the same back with amendments and with the recommendation that the resolution be passed as amended.

Mr. MORTON. I demand the previous question on the joint resolution and amendments.

The previous question was seconded, there being—ayes 104, noes 12.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the joint resolution, there were—ayes 109, noes 41.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 69, not voting 54; as follows:

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now insist upon my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

11. To the naval establishment, other than the appropriations for its support: to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

12. To the Post-Office and post-roads, other than appropriations for their support: to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. MONEY. If it is now in order I desire to offer an amendment to that clause of this rule which has just been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "other than," and in lieu thereof insert the word "including;" so that if the amendment is adopted this clause will then read, "to the Post-Office and post-roads, including appropriations for their support: to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads."

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, I feel a great delicacy in asking this amendment at the hands of this House after the recent discussion and the previous action taken on cognate questions. But I am moved to do this by what I consider the necessities of the public service. I do it at the request of the members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. There is not a single bill which comes to this House that is looked to with as much interest by the people of all the States of this Union in every community as the bill appropriating money for the support of the Post-Office Department. No other Department of this Government has such intimate relations with the people, with all classes and communities of this Government, as the Post-Office. It touches them, sir, at every point. It touches them in all their business, in all their domestic, and all their social relations, and of necessity the bill appropriating money for its support should come from a committee intimately acquainted with its wants.

I submit to this House it is impossible from the very nature of things that a committee so burdened with business of a multiplied character as the Committee on Appropriations can inform themselves so minutely of the necessities of the postal service as the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. And I would have the House to believe that committee if intrusted with this work would report in a spirit of economy, but measure that economy by the requirements of that service.

It was stated on yesterday by the gentleman who has charge of this report from the Committee on Rules—and I do him the credit to say I do not think he intended to misrepresent the matter at all or to prejudice this House against the distribution of appropriation bills to the several committees having charge of these several Departments—it was said yesterday by that gentleman that the bill reported at the last session of Congress for the support of the Post-Office Department was increased $1,000,000 by motions emanating from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The gentleman is mistaken as to the facts. I did not hear him at the time or I would have corrected him at that point, but reading this morning his remarks on that subject, I find he has made that statement. It is immaterial who reported those amendments, but I wish to say that of $975,000 appropriated in addition to the report of the Committee on Appropriations $485,000 was reported by members of the Committee on Appropriations. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars was added by the amendment of my colleague from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] for the benefit of the steamboat service. One hundred thousand dollars was added by the amendment of Mr. PAGE, of California, in behalf of the letter-carrier service. Of the amount added by the Committee of the Whole only $210,000 came from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and that was by an amendment offered by myself on the star service. But it matters not from whom these amendments come. The sequel has proved their wisdom; for to-day, notwithstanding this increase of $975,000, we are asked for $2,000,000 deficiencies for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is that the way you demonstrate it?

Mr. MONEY. No, sir; if the gentleman will just allow me to finish I will tell him. I will not stop to inquire, in the limited time I have, whether that amount of money has been expended judiciously or not, whether it has been spent unadvisedly or corruptly or not. That matter is now being investigated by the Committee on Appropriations, which finds time in all the multiplicity of its business to make the investigation, and I await their report before I pronounce a decision upon the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I first desire to hear the evidence against him.

But at any rate of that $2,000,000 of deficiency it is claimed only $900,000 of it was caused by what we may at least term a judicious expenditure in expediting the schedule of time and increasing the number of trips in the far West.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is it possible that the Committee on Appropriations shall so acquaint themselves with the necessities of the postal service as to be able to report a bill here absolutely meeting exactly all its demands.

This service, sir, is continually growing. We have not got a finished country. We are developing all the time. We are in process of rapid growth. The past decade will show an increase of population of at least ten or twelve millions. In this last year we have increased our post-offices by 1,597; the steamboat service increased 3,000 miles, the star service 8,000 miles, and the railroad service about 3,000 miles. It is impossible that any man, I do not care what his ability is, can keep pace with the growing demands of this service unless his study of it runs pari passu with its growth.

I submit the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is the appropriate committee to report this bill. And I deprecate that spirit on the part of any member of the Committee of the Whole which would lose the valuable report of the Committee on Rules unless we take it entire. We had it yesterday from two members of the Committee on Rules and one member of the Committee on Appropriations that they would be willing to lose the whole work of the Committee on Rules last summer if we in Committee of the Whole were not willing to intrust the Committee on Appropriations practically with the control of all the business of this House. And it was stated that it would be destructive to the Treasury if these appropriation bills were distributed among other committees.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not know how the gentleman from Mississippi managed in five minutes' time, unless he had the indulgence of the Chair, to put before the Committee of the Whole as many mistakes as he has committed. I am sure I cannot reply to them in five minutes.

The member of the Committee on Rules and member of the Committee on Appropriations did not say on yesterday, and the RECORD does not warrant the charge, that he was in favor of repudiating and rejecting this whole revision of the rules if the appropriation bills were distributed. But he stated that if that was done and the present existing barrier against an increase of appropriations by way of amendment was stricken down, then, and only then, the report should be rejected.

Mr. MONEY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Not out of my time. I stand upon the record, and I hold the gentleman from Mississippi to the record.

The gentleman was mistaken in another thing. He was mistaken if he expected to succeed in drawing me off to a discussion of the two-million-dollar deficiency which now stares us in the face in the star service of which the gentleman speaks, and of which he has stood before the House in this and the last Congress as the avowed champion.

Mr. MONEY. No, sir. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not yield. I did not interrupt the gentleman from Mississippi and I decline to be interrupted by him. He is mistaken when he says that but $900,000 of that deficiency is traceable to what may be termed increased allowances to existing routes, or else the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was mistaken when under oath he swore that more than $1,100,000 of it was traceable there.

The question presented by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is simply this: whether the Post-Office appropriation bill according to estimates submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, requiring in the next fiscal year $39,900,000, shall be turned over to the custody of the committee over which that gentleman worthily presides, he who supported, indorsed, and upheld by vote and voice an increase of $975,000 in excess of the amount reported to the last Congress by the Committee on Appropriations. There is to be found, sir, in this House no one committee more deserving probably than that for its untiring energy and faithful service. But candor compels me to add that the record shows there is not to be found in this House a single committee now clamoring for additional power a compliance with whose demand is more dangerous than that of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. One million of money in round numbers I stated on yesterday, and I repeat to-day, was added to the bill of the Committee on Appropriations for the support of the postal service in the last Congress. And I appeal to that gentleman to say if there was ever a proposition made to increase the appropriations for the postal service one dollar for which he did not vote or speak.

This question was decided yesterday. When the proposition was made to carry the Army and the fortification bills to the Military Affairs Committee and was voted down, I take it that this Committee of the Whole House declared its purpose to make no further exceptions, but to leave the appropriation bills where they are. I do not believe that further discussion will suffice to change the vote of a single man on this floor. I believe that the Committee of the Whole House is prepared to vote on every one of these isolated propositions as they come up. The gentleman from Mississippi has had his five minutes; I have had mine or a part of it; and I trust that this committee will now go forward without further delay and vote upon every proposition submitted that looks to the commitment into new hands of a single appropriation that is now intrusted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to say that if there is a committee in this House——

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CONGER. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY.]

Mr. CONGER. I desire to be heard upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has moved to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. When that amendment shall have been disposed of, another amendment will be in order, and the gentleman will be recognized in due time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have very little to say in relation to this debate on the rules. So far as labor is concerned, I undertake to say that there is not a committee of all those which are struggling for the appropriation bills who have so fine a field of work as the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and who could, if they had seen fit, have relieved the Committee on Appropriations of a vast amount of work, have done the country a vast service, and saved the Treasury millions of dollars.

Mr. MONEY. We are trying to do that now.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. It is well known that there has been pressed upon this House for years a proposition to change the method of paying the railroads of the country for carrying our mails. Yet in past Congresses not a word upon that subject has come from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

It is well known that the system of letting mail contracts has resulted in abuses involving millions of dollars. Yet not a single thing has been done on that subject, so far as I am aware, by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. MONEY. The gentleman is incorrect when he makes that assertion.

Mr. BLOUNT. Whether they have done it or not, those gentlemen have had ample time to consider that subject. Again there have been complaints of attempts to put legislation on the appropriation bills. Sir, the legislation on the Post-Office appropriation bill has come not from the Committee on Appropriations but from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, legislation involving the reclassification of mail matter, and various propositions of that kind. And complaints have been made that the Committee on Appropriations would not allow on the appropriation bill all the legislation which has been suggested by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

I undertake to say that if there is a committee of this House with great questions before it, enough to occupy it for the whole session in maturing legislation which will result in the improvement of the public service, it is the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The gentleman talks about the propriety of referring the appropriation bills to that committee because of the subjects to which those appropriations relate. Sir, there is no mystery about those appropriations. Here are the estimates on a single page; one item involves $10,000 for railroads, and you may go all through them and there is no mystery about them. There is the statement of receipts and expenditures and an estimate concerning the growth of the service, submitted to us every single year. There is no man who cannot take these simple figures and reach a proper conclusion as to what should be done. There is no legislation involved in it.

If gentlemen will examine the RECORD in reference to the appropriations for the postal service they will be astonished to see how simple a thing is that for which the gentleman is struggling, and in regard to which he is complaining that the Committee on Appropriations are attempting to seize all the power in this House. But the gentleman said awhile ago in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] as to certain increases of appropriations which he had supported——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I was not present yesterday when the Committee of the Whole was engaged in considering the report of the Committee on Rules; but if I understand the situation at the close of yesterday's session, the new rules have been made to provide for three appropriation committees, and it is now proposed to provide for a fourth.

Now, unless we, the representatives of the people, are to invent some substitute for industry and economy, making money free to all; unless it be wise for us to have two or more Speakers of this House, I cannot, for my life, see why we should have two or more appropriation committees. Did any man in his right mind ever send a good ship to sea with two equal masters? Can any household or any government prosper with its treasury wide open to each member of the household as a committee on appropriations? The case seems to me to admit of no argument. The provision in the rules as they now stand for three appropriation committees seems to me as absurd as it would be to propose the election of two more Speakers, of equal authority with the present incumbent. I can see no substantial difference in the cases. These appropriation committees, if the door of the Treasury is opened to them all, will inevitably deplete the Treasury, if they are human. It is necessary for the Government to control the Treasury. It cannot do it under any such system of rules as would allow each of the standing committees of the House to fix and determine its own appropriations. The case, as I have said, does not admit of argument. The truth of it must be obvious to every man who will take the facts home for his own private consideration, free from prejudice.

I hope that we shall be permitted to adopt these rules substantially as presented in the report of the committee. They are universally admitted to be an immense improvement upon the one hundred and sixty-six rules that we now have, a piece of patchwork nearly one hundred years old, which no one can pretend to understand. Every member can understand these forty-seven propositions. They are probably not perfect; but a little experience will enable the House to perfect them. It does seem to me in the last degree a waste of time for this House to go on day after day, week after week, and month after month discussing practically the question whether we shall open the Treasury for an eager scramble by all the committees. For my part I hope we shall speedily have done with this question and pass the rules substantially as they came from the committee. It was a great work for that committee to bring in unanimously such an improvement upon the present rules. Their revision is, in my judgment, worthy of our instant approval.

Mr. VALENTINE obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Nebraska that debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] offered an amendment pro forma, and spoke in favor of that amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] followed upon the same side. The other side of the question has not been heard. I submit to the Chair whether the other side cannot be heard upon an amendment on which debate is limited to ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia proposed a mere formal amendment to strike out the last word, and occupied his five minutes. The gentleman from New York arose and discussed, as the gentleman from Georgia had done, the general question involved in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi. Of course the Chair could not know when the gentleman from New York arose what he proposed to say; and when he had proceeded with his remarks no question was made as to his being in order.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Has not debate been exhausted on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move, then, as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, to strike out the two words preceding the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has announced distinctly that the gentleman from Georgia has moved to amend by striking out the last word; and until that amendment is withdrawn by the consent of the committee or disposed of by a vote, no further amendment will be in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I renew the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. VALENTINE.] He will recognize the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] presently.

Mr. VALENTINE. I renew the amendment to strike out the last word. I hope the Committee of the Whole will adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY.] I believe it is in the right direction. Two months ago to-day I introduced a resolution into this House calling upon the Post-Office Department for information as to why the mails were not carried upon certain railroads in the West and why increased facilities, as demanded by the interest of the people, were not given. A few days after the introduction of that resolution the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads came to me and said that his committee had all the information from the Department as called for by that resolution, stating that they had sent to the Committee on Appropriations estimates in the shape of a deficiency bill. I immediately called upon the gentlemen composing the sub-committee on appropriations having charge of appropriations for the Post-Office Department and urged upon them the necessities of the people in my own State. I was informed by the chairman of that sub-committee that they were so busy, that the work of the committee was so great, that they could not report back that deficiency bill until after the recess. Time and again I have been urging those gentlemen to report this deficiency bill. I was informed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] that they had, under instructions of the House, entered upon an investigation of the star service, and until that was completed no appropriation bill for deficiencies of the Post-Office Department could be reported.

During the last year there have been added to the inhabitants of the State of Nebraska from one hundred thousand to one hundred and twenty thousand people by immigration. There have been built over five hundred miles of railroad, on many miles of which to-day the mails are not carried. On others the pouch service is the only service we have, for the reason that the appropriation for postal clerks has been exhausted by reason of the great revival in the business of the country during the year. A few days ago I introduced and asked unanimous consent to have at once considered a resolution directing the Committee on Appropriations to report the Post-Office deficiency bill in their hands to this House, excepting the items of appropriation for the star service. This I left out on account of the investigation now being made. Objection was promptly made, and made by a member of the Committee on Appropriations, who, not content with simply objecting, added to his objection language uncalled for and unnecessary, if not discourteous. As that committee is so crowded with work, I feel that it ought to be relieved. This is now a good time and a good opportunity by adopting this amendment to relieve it of some of its work. I think it ought to be done.

We have a Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, of which I am a member. But when an examination into such expenditures is proposed to be made we see the Appropriations Committee coming forward by one of its own members and asking that they be instructed to make such investigation. The Committee on Appropriations being thus crowded with outside work, which by the rules belongs to other committees, I think this amendment should be adopted. If the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is allowed to report appropriations for the postal service, I believe that service throughout the country will be benefited thereby.

Mr. CONGER rose.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish to make any amendment which will afford me an opportunity to reply to the personal remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CONGER. I have the floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I rise to a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the rule and conform to it unless there is something in the case to make it an exception. The rule is that no gentleman can be allowed to speak more than once until other gentlemen desiring to speak have been heard.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does not that apply to amendments as they may be offered?

The CHAIRMAN. It does.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am, then, asking to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true; but the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Michigan. If the gentleman from Kentucky, however, wishes to make a personal explanation——

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; I am not willing to dignify the thing by asking to make any personal explanation in reference to it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is the gentleman rising to a personal explanation or speaking to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has taken his seat, and is not speaking to the amendment, and he does not ask to make any personal explanation.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have taken my seat, because the floor is refused me.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Then I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; the gentleman from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have to say then that I have three times addressed the Chair. Previous to his giving the floor to the gentleman who has just taken his seat the Chair said he would recognize me next.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken. The Chair informed the gentleman from Louisiana distinctly that he would recognize him after the gentleman from Michigan who is now upon the floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The question will rise again whether the debate on this amendment will not be exhausted after the gentleman from Michigan has closed his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentlemen on the floor who seem to be anxious to address the committee on this subject, that as long as anybody sees proper to offer an amendment, either a substantial or a formal one, it will be in order to do so, provided only no more than two amendments are pending at the same time. As soon as one is voted on another will be in order, and the Chair hopes in that way an opportunity will be afforded to every gentleman to be heard who desires it.

Mr. CONGER. This does not come out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, in common with a good many other gentlemen of this committee, I have not been in favor of taking from the Committee on Appropriations the performance of their usual, regular, long-accustomed duty. In general, I am in favor of having a Committee of Appropriations who shall take the laws of the United States as they find them on the statute-book in regard to salaries and all expenditures specifically provided for by law and embody them in regular appropriation bills on those subjects. I think as a rule perhaps it would be dangerous to the business of the House, perhaps dangerous to the business of the country, to have all appropriations distributed among the committees appointed to propose legislation in regard to those subjects. I make this broad distinction and I wish I may have order while I am speaking——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes that the gentleman will have order in the House, but it seems impossible to secure it.

Mr. CONGER. I repeat, sir, I make this broad distinction which does not seem to be made by many in talking on this subject. I hold the committees, to which is referred by our rules and practice the control of particular subjects, like the Naval Affairs, Military Affairs, post-office matters, and things of that kind, being those matters committed to them for the express purpose of advising this House what legislation is necessary on them—I hold those committees have the absolute power and control—as far as we give it to any committee in the House, to shape and fashion and originate and press forward such legislation as well on salaries and appropriations as on all other subjects committed to them which can come before this House. It is their duty to do it. If they complain there is not a sufficient appropriation for a particular subject, it is their duty to bring in a law beforehand in order to make it necessary to make appropriation.

I have not time to dwell on that, but I hold on the other hand, as a counterpart to that power of all the committees, that the Committee on Appropriations should be confined to carrying out the laws which are passed in pursuance of the recommendation of other committees. They should be held to make appropriations according to law; they should not invade the domain of other committees and proposed legislation the subject-matter of which has been committed to committees equally conversant with it, and having more time to devote to it and better acquainted with the nature of the service and the wants of the several Departments committed to them. Whenever this House or any House can draw the dividing line so the Appropriations Committee shall appropriate according to law and leave other committees more familiar with their different Departments to propose legislation, we shall have arrived at a time when and a result which will prevent this continual encroachment of one committee on another. We shall then have accomplished what we desire, so that each member shall stand as the law recognizes him, as the equal and peer of every other member, and the committees of this House shall stand here as the equals and peers of every other committee, entitled to like respect and similar confidence of the House. When that is done, sir, we shall have removed one of the greatest hinderances to legislation. More than that, we shall have removed one of the greatest hinderances to good legislation. I say that from a long observation of these conflicts and these jealousies and these suspicions and these criminations of members against committees and of members against individual members of committees. If we will make further rules to hold committees to their proper and legitimate work, the business of this House will go on with a correctness which it has never reached in my experience. Until then, in my opinion, we shall have this continual jangling, this continual desire to detract from the Appropriations Committee and take from it even the rights which it has.

And allow me to say before closing, that if we cannot hold the Appropriations Committee to the performance of its proper and legitimate duty in this House, then for one I will go with all other men who will go with me, first to shear them of their assumed powers and if necessary to reduce them to a position where they will have but little power in this House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move to strike out the last word in order to yield my time to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY.]

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, nothing was further from my intention than in any way to misrepresent language used by the gentleman from Kentucky; but if I have failed to represent him correctly, it is from a misconstruction of his language, which I now beg to read to this House. The gentleman, in speaking on this subject, uses this language, which I take from this morning's RECORD:

> If this proposition for the distribution of the appropriation bills shall be adopted without limitation, and then if the only safeguard that we hold to-day under the rule upon the people's Treasury is to be stricken down, I sincerely, honestly, and earnestly trust that the report made by the Committee on Rules in the shape of a revision, so mangled and marred, with all its sins, if it has any, and with whatever good may belong to it, may be rejected and spewed out of the mouth of this House.

That is the gentleman's own language—"spewed out of the mouth of this House."

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I say that now.

Mr. MONEY. Exactly. Then I gave the proper construction to the language of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What is the statement?

Mr. MONEY. That I gave the proper construction to your language.

Mr. BLACKBURN. On the contrary, the gentleman misconstrued it as broadly as it was possible for human ingenuity to do so.

Mr. MONEY. Very well, sir. If I have misconstrued the language of the gentleman, as I find it in the RECORD——

Mr. BLACKBURN. What page?

Mr. MONEY. If I have misconstrued the gentleman's language, then, in justice to myself as well as to him, I take great pleasure in absolving him from the intention which in my view his language plainly expressed. But to proceed with the matter under discussion. How was it possible that a committee charged with the responsibility of reporting an appropriation bill upon a subject which it is presumed to understand, from the very nature of the charges imposed upon it by the House in its organization, can be any less held to their responsibility by the Committee of the Whole House than any other committee in this House?

Sir, no committee of this House passes an appropriation bill. These committees are the eyes, the ears, and the hands of the House to obtain for it the information needed for intelligent legislation. And when a committee has reported a bill to the House it has fulfilled its whole duty, and it then rests with the Committee of the Whole to make the appropriation that in its judgment may be necessary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as far as investigation is being conducted by the Committee on Appropriations, with that I have nothing whatever to do; I have no concern whatever with that. The gentleman from Kentucky mistakes me much if he supposes I have at any time appeared or will hereafter appear upon the floor of this House as the champion of any man in the executive department of the Government or elsewhere. But I beg to remind him I have on the floor of this House spoken, not in the language of invective but in terms of animadversion on the very officer whom he is now investigating, more severe than were used in my hearing by any other member on this floor. I said I suspended my judgment until the gentleman should have made his report and submitted to this House any evidence he may accumulate.

But what has that to do with the matter under consideration? In the administration of the postal affairs of this country are we to punish the people of the whole country for the sins of one man? We have heard of the vicarious suffering of one for the sins of the many; but the gentleman would punish the whole country for the sins of one man if he is proved guilty.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Whose proposition is that?

Mr. MONEY. I beg the gentleman will not interrupt me in the short time I have.

I ask where is the danger spoken of by the gentleman from Kentucky in the diffusion of power? We have been taught the great danger to be dreaded was in a centralization of power, not in its diffusion. We have been taught to apprehend that was the one evil which the people of this country should be taught to guard against most sedulously. But now we are taught that a diffusion of power among the members of this House is dangerous to the interests of the country and to the public service.

It is impossible, Mr. Chairman, in the nature of things that the rules as they stand to-day reported by the Committee on Rules shall promote the public service as much as they would with the amendments which have been offered from time to time. Sir, there is a higher statesmanship than consists merely in reducing expenditures. There is such a thing as understanding the necessities of a country like ours which is increasing its population one and a quarter millions every year—a country that demands something for its development rather than for the restriction of its service.

If it be so, if we have no greater duty than to see to what minimum we can cut down the expenditures of this Government, then we have little business here. I am in favor of economy; I am in favor of a judicious expenditure of the public money; I am in favor of strict accountability for official conduct; but I am in favor at the same time of that sort of legislation in the way of appropriations that will develop the resources of the country, that will stimulate all the sources of revenue, that will give the people of this country, expanding every year, proportionately extended privileges, and that will better bring into communication with each other all the communities over the whole breadth of this land.

For these reasons I ask the Committee of the Whole to remit this question of appropriations for the Post-Office Department to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I credit the gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee with the fullest measure of zeal for the public service; but I claim the same credit for the members of the committee to which I have the honor to belong.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAKER. I rise to oppose the amendment.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that as I have not either during the general debate or during the five-minute discussion said anything at all on the question of the revision of the rules, I trust I may have the attention of the committee during the five minutes which I may now occupy.

Mr. Chairman, my judgment convinces me that it would be one of the most unwise and unfortunate things that could happen to the legislation of this House if the work that has heretofore been confided to the Appropriations Committee should be taken from it and distributed around among the various legislative committees of this House. There is a natural tendency on the part of every committee that is charged with the general subject of legislation to draw to itself whatever power it may be able to draw; and if in addition to the power that it now has it is clothed with the further power of appropriating for all the wants of the service it has in charge, the natural tendency would be to increase the amount of appropriations so that they would get beyond the control of the House.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it would be almost fatal in a party sense to the party having control if they were to disperse among eight or ten different committees the subject of appropriations. It would be an illogical course. It would put it beyond the power of the House to control the appropriations; for the reason, Mr. Chairman, that no one except those who are charged specially with the investigation of the subject can have the minute information essential for the guidance of the committee that has charge of the bill.

But while I consider that it would be unwise to distribute this power I cannot permit myself to disguise the fact that we ought at least in the distribution of work in the various committees of this House to be logical and sensible in making that distribution. .If the Committee on Appropriations is to be charged not only with the appropriate work of appropriations, but if in addition to that it is to have the same power in reference to the origination of the general legislation that is confided to the various committees of the House, so as to make it in fact not only the representative of the legislative power of all the committees but having in addition its own peculiar power besides, I say the logical balance of our system of legislation is disturbed. This power can only be fittingly lodged in the hands of the several committees of the House who are charged with this legislative power.

It logically follows that if with the power of recommending appropriations there is to be coupled the power to originate general legislation, that power ought to go to the committees that are generally charged by the House with the exercise of such legislative power. For one I can see no middle course. It will hardly do to follow in the line indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to charge the general committees of the House with the preparation of appropriation bills, and then remit them for further consideration to the Committee on Appropriations. All legislative experience proves that wherever power is dissipated between two or more committees of the House, so that neither the House nor the country can hold either of them responsible for the bills that are matured and brought forward, there will be not only a failure of proper attention to such bills, but there will be danger of even worse evils than we now experience in the progress of legislation under the present rules.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON to strike out the last word; and being taken, it was not agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CLYMER. That amendment has just been voted down.

Mr. KEIFER. Then I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FINLEY. My point of order is that the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] was to strike out the last word, and that amendment has been acted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. FINLEY. I understood him to move to strike out the last word.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to strike out the last two words. This seems to be a good time, Mr. Chairman, while considering this subject, to express our opinions generally on a clause in Rule XXI of the new rules reported.

I wish to say that I am opposed to the pending amendment in relation to the transfer of the Post-Office appropriation bill from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; that is, I am opposed to it provided Rule XXI shall be amended as I think it ought to be amended. I desire to say that in my judgment it is better to have one common appropriation committee, whose duties shall be confined entirely to the preparation of appropriation bills in accordance with existing law.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that if you transfer to the various committees of this House the duties of preparing the several appropriation bills there will be a strife between those committees, the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and so on through, each striving to obtain the most appropriations for the Department of the Government directly under its charge, and in that way we will necessarily augment the annual appropriations beyond the ordinary revenues of the Government.

While, however, that in my mind would be a great evil, it would be simple and insignificant in comparison with the evils that would result from the operation of clause 3 in Rule XXI as now reported, and which have resulted from the rule as it now exists. That clause is a mere trap. It has been claimed by our distinguished Speaker that it furnishes the great means of reducing appropriations and saving money to the people. But I have observed in this Congress, I observed in the last session, that the sole purpose of that clause was to enable the Committee on Appropriations to hang political legislation on appropriation bills. Under the guise of that clause of our rule, we were here during the last session for more than three months, standing face to face and eye to eye, fighting over the question as to whether we should repeal our election laws, and whether we should by a law of this Government make it a crime to keep the peace at the polls on election days. There was no such thing as retrenchment intended. All that was intended was to coerce the minority of this House and to coerce the Executive of this Government to submit legislation dictated by the majority of this House on the other side. That is what is meant by this clause under the guise of retrenchment to force legislation upon appropriation bills.

Let me give you an example that is not political. I remember that in the Forty-fifth Congress, by more than a two-thirds vote of this House and by a unanimous vote of the Senate, regardless of party, we passed what was known as the letter-carrier bill; yet when this same Appropriations Committee came to deal with that matter they said in substance that the House and the Senate that passed the letter-carrier bill and the Executive who approved of it did not understand the subject. They said they would cut that bill to pieces or they would make no appropriations at all for the purpose. That committee came in here with an appropriation bill containing a very small sum of money for the letter-carrier branch of the service, and with new legislation, proposing altogether to repeal and overthrow the action of the House and the Senate. We fought that committee here for a whole day to compel it to make appropriations in accordance with existing law. That committee did not report those provisions under any guise of retrenchment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of obtaining from the House an order to close debate upon the pending paragraph.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 93, noes 23.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the proposed revision of the rules reported from the Committee on Rules and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 325) for the erection of a public building at Danville, Virginia.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 56) for the relief of Edward Braden and J. W. Angus;

A bill (S. No. 715) for the relief of the estate of N. Boyden;

A bill (S. No. 857) authorizing the conversion of national gold banks; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 75) to print the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Zachariah Chandler.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules, and pending that motion I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

Mr. MONEY. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. BLACKBURN to limit debate in Committee of the Whole, it was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate upon the pending clause and pending amendments thereto is limited to one minute. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] to strike out the two last words. If there be no objection this amendment, being pro forma merely, will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. MONEY, to strike out the words "other than" and to insert the word "including;" so as to make the clause read:

To the Post-Office and post-roads, including appropriations for their support: to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 75, noes 89.

Mr. MONEY. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MONEY and Mr. FINLEY were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 97.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the pending clause by striking out the words "other than appropriations for their support," and adding after the word "Roads," in the last line, the words "and said committee shall report the general appropriation bill for the support of the Post-Office and post-roads, which shall be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment,

The CHAIRMAN said: In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 87.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

13. To the lands of the United States: to the Committee on the Public Lands;
14. To the relations of the United States with the Indians and the Indian tribes: to the Committee on Indian Affairs;
15. To territorial legislation, the revision thereof, and affecting Territories or the admission of States: to the Committee on the Territories;
16. To railways and canals other than Pacific railroads: to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. CABELL. I move as a substitute for the clause last read the following:

To the improvement of the navigation of rivers and to railways and canals other than Pacific railroads: to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. FRYE. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow this amendment to go over till to-morrow, I will move that the committee now rise.

Mr. CABELL. That will be agreeable to me, if it is the sense of the committee.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to, there being—ayes 117, noes 37.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the revision of the rules, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. SCALES asked leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers regarding the publication of Gettysburgh data, no adverse report having been made; which application was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS IN MONTANA.

Mr. BARBER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4232) to investigate certain claims for property destroyed by Indians in Montana Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKENZIE. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent to have taken up and passed a bill which has already passed the Senate, and to which there can be no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 5, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of March 1, 1879, information in the possession of the Treasury Department showing the relative quantities and natures of the various kinds of fermented and alcoholic liquors imported into the United States from foreign countries; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in obedience to law, an abstract of the militia force of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DISTRICT SINKING FUND.

Mr. ROLLINS. On Tuesday morning last the Vice-President laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of the Treasurer of the United States on the operations of the sinking fund pertaining to the District of Columbia; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, remonstrating against the passage of a law for the construction of a bridge across the Detroit River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BECK presented the petition of Bartlett Taylor and others, citizens of Shelby County, Kentucky, praying for the passage of the bill (S. No. 865) to provide for the investment of certain unclaimed pay and bounty moneys now in the Treasury of the United States, and to facilitate and encourage the education of the colored race in the several States and Territories, and that the University of Wilberforce be included therein; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of Alfred Williams, Joseph Cohen, and 63 others, citizens of South Carolina, praying Congress to allow Wilberforce University an equal portion of the $510,000 unpaid colored volunteer soldiers' bounty now in the Treasury of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of William B. Scott, jr., and 35 others, and the petition of James Edward Calhoun and 16 others, citizens of South Carolina, praying for an appropriation by Congress for the improvement of the Savannah River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BALDWIN presented the petition of J. B. Mullikea, general manager of the Detroit, Lansing and Northern Railroad Company, praying that the duty on steel rails may be specific, and not to exceed $10 per ton; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, presented two petitions of citizens of Florida, praying that a portion of the $510,000 of the unclaimed bounty fund be given to the Wilberforce University, in the State of Ohio; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HOAR presented additional papers in the case of Mrs. Mary S. Porter; which were referred to the Committee on Claims, to accompany the bill (S. No. 1120) for the relief of Mrs. Mary S. Porter.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from West Virginia if there is no business in which the Senate could profitably be employed? The public business has not been so backward as it is now at any session of Congress since I entered it ten years ago.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I know of nothing that is pressing upon the Senate. I do know, however, of a great deal of committee work that ought to be done; and the object of my motion is to afford an opportunity for committee work. I think that we should make more by adjourning over, and permitting the committees to do their duty, than by coming here and sitting an hour or two to-morrow, and then adjourning to Monday, in which case to-morrow would be lost to committee work. However, if the Senator from Massachusetts has any business for the Senate to consider, if there is anything that he can suggest as requiring the attention of the Senate to-morrow, I shall with pleasure withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me, I do not speak with reference to the condition of business in the Senate alone or principally, but with regard to the general business, the bills coming over from the other House. Unless I am mistaken the public business has never been so backward as it is now for a great many years. I suppose, without violating parliamentary law, it is not improper to say that there may be changes in the rules of some other body which will be likely to send all the appropriation bills to the Committee of the Whole again after they have been once over here, considered, amended; and if those changes take place another month in the summer will be added to the session.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that our sitting to-morrow would not forward the appropriation bills in the least. There are no such bills that I know of in the Senate that are lagging. There may be causes elsewhere over which we have no control that will tend to prolong the session.

Mr. ALLISON rose.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend from Iowa will say a word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This is not a debatable motion.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to say a word about the appropriation bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and unanimous consent is granted.

Mr. ALLISON. The only appropriation bill that I know of now in the Senate is the bill with reference to fortifications, of which I have charge. I would say with regard to that bill that I have consented to its postponement until next week on account of the absence of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] who desires to be present when it is considered and who is unavoidably absent this week.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to make an inquiry about our Calendar, which lies before us on our desks, with two hundred and six cases reported from the various committees of the Senate. It is a Calendar of seven pages of bills, which have been carefully considered, I suppose, by the committees, and most of which it is important to have considered. There are many local bills, bills for individual relief, on the Calendar, which ought to be considered, it strikes me, before the appropriation bills reach us. There are some cases on the Calendar certainly that ought to receive attention.

Mr. ALLISON. I think, if the Senator will allow me to make a single remark, that there will be ample opportunity to consider the Calendar. I agree with the Senator from West Virginia that we can forward the business of the Senate better by adjourning over to Monday than by sitting here to-morrow. Therefore I shall vote for the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. PADDOCK. I sincerely hope for one that the Senate will this week depart from the rule which has been observed so closely during this session of adjourning over from Thursday to Monday.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Has the Senator anything perfected that he wishes the Senate to consider? If so, there is no disposition to adjourn over.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will simply repeat what I said before. Here is a Calendar of bills which have been considered by the various committees of the Senate and which have been reported for the action of the Senate. They cover seven pages of the Calendar, numbering over two hundred. If there was any reason why they should have been considered by the committees so early in the session, there certainly ought to be a reason why they should be considered at this time by the Senate. There are no bills on the Calendar that I am particularly interested in, but there must be bills upon it that ought to be considered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I presume the discussion this morning will do no harm to the country or to the Senate. I hope it may be heard in the other end of the Capitol. I desire to say in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that it is a well known fact that the chairman of an important committee there, the Committee on Appropriations, has been sick for a month. It is also well known that there are three or four appropriation bills now perfected and ready for action in the House, but owing to the consideration of the rules of the House they have been delayed, as I understand.

As the Senators upon the opposite side wish to do business to-morrow, I withdraw the motion to adjourn over, and hope that the Senate may profit by it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn. Reports of committees are next in order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I should like to state my reasons, inasmuch as other Senators have given reasons for and against the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This is not a debatable motion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I think we had better work an hour at least for four days in the week, instead of meeting every day for about half an hour and then going into executive business. We can attend to work three or four hours for four days in the week, and then have two days for committee and departmental work.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair reminds the Senator that this is not a debatable motion.

The question being put, there were on division—ayes 19, noes 22.

Mr. EATON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] and my colleague [Mr. WALKER] are detained at home to-day on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Allison,	Hamlin,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Anthony,	Harris,	Platt,	Windom.
Booth,	Hill of Colorado,	Plumb,

Carpenter,	Jonas,	Saunders,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I give notice that at the close of the morning business I shall ask the Senate to take up a joint resolution making an appropriation for certain employés.

Mr. BECK. I desire to give notice, so as not to give offense to any gentleman by objecting to a particular bill, that I shall insist upon going to the Calendar and taking the bills in their regular order. I shall object to any person picking out bills on the Calendar, and giving a particular bill preference over any other bill. If we are to proceed with the Calendar, I shall insist that we proceed in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 48) for promoting the efficiency of the corps of chaplains of the United States Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. McDONALD. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of P. A. Wellford, praying that his claim be referred to the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, to make a report, which I ask to have read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of P. A. Wellford, praying the reference of his claim for captured cotton to the Court of Claims with right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, report that in the opinion of your committee the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The committee report adversely to the petition, and ask that the same be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 32) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the brig Katie, reported adversely thereon, and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 816) for the relief of Theodore F. Hartridge and William G. Christopher, sureties on the official bond of Felix G. Livingston, collector of customs at Fernandina, Florida, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2771) to construe an act entitled "An act granting condemned bronze cannon to the Soldiers' Union of West Virginia," reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of William C. Shimoneck, praying for an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 950) granting arrears of pension to Nancy Eubank, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 497) granting a pension to J. Clinton De Witt, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COKE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 827) to facilitate the negotiation of bills of lading and other commercial instruments, and to punish fraud therein, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

REPORT ON FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following concurrent resolution, reported it without amendment:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 3,000 sets of the five volumes of the Reports of the United States Fish Commission be printed from the stereotype plates, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,500 for the House of Representatives, and 500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the letter from the Secretary of War asking an appropriation of $6,500 to defray expenses of printing and binding the catalogue of the library of the Surgeon-General's Office, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUTLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1225) to remove the political disabilities of Jonathan H. Carter, of South Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1226) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue to the Richland Volunteer Rifle Company, a volunteer company of South Carolina militia, seventy-five rifles; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1227) to provide for the erection of a public building at Oxford, Mississippi, for use as a post-office, United States court, and for United States internal-revenue officials, and for other Government purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1228) for the relief of certain employés on the work for the improvement of the Des Moines Rapids of the Mississippi River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1229) to authorize and direct the Commissioner of Agriculture to attend, in person or by deputy, the international sheep and wool show to be held in the Centennial buildings, at Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, in September, A. D. 1880, and to make full and complete report of the same, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1230) to establish a port of delivery at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAYMENT OF EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Pursuant to the notice I gave, I ask that the joint resolution (H. R. No. 157) for the relief of M. M. Herr be now taken up.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to M. M. Herr $605 for services as assistant sergeant-at-arms to the House of Representatives during the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Appropriations, with an amendment, to add:

That the following sum be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for salaries of officers of the Senate, namely:

For salaries of three messengers, under Senate resolution of December 11, 1879, for the fiscal year 1880, $2,355.65.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As several Senators have asked me what the joint resolution, as amended, means, I propose to explain it. It will be recollected that in December the Senate passed a resolution employing three additional messengers, which were given to our friends on the opposite side of the Chamber. No provision was made in that resolution for their payment, and up to this time they have not been paid. The amendment is intended to pay them for their services.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution for the relief of M. M. Herr and to pay three messengers of the Senate."

ORDER OF BUSINESS—THE CALENDAR.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 194) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Harker military reservation.

Mr. BECK. Regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky has filed a standing objection for the day against taking bills from the Calendar out of their order.

Mr. BECK. I desire the Calendar to be proceeded with regularly, if we are going on with legislative business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. For the remainder of the morning hour the Secretary will report in its order the Calendar of concurrent and other resolutions.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that we proceed regularly with the Calendar of bills, not only during the remainder of the morning hour but during the day. The resolutions are not pressing.

Mr. BECK. I wish to say a word only. I was in favor of adjourning over until Monday because of the immense amount of work that is to be attended to in committee. I know that the Committee on Appropriations is engaged in discussing a bill recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, authorizing Congress to take charge of all the indefinite permanent appropriations instead of letting them run on as they are doing now without the action of Congress. We have had two or three sessions of the committee on two or three days for this purpose. It is impossible to do this work when the Senate is in session and we have to attend to business here. I know that a number of other gentlemen are at work on committees. We can do more work in committee while the Senate is not in session, ten times over, than by sitting here and picking out bills here and there on the Calendar. I do not believe it is a good rule to allow this Senator or the other to pick out a bill on the Calendar that we are not expecting to be called up, that we have no means of knowing the Senate is going to consider; and then gentlemen are offended if, when they say it is a meritorious bill, you do not yield at once to their request for its consideration. In my judgment, if the committees are not to go on with their work and if we are to sit here every day the better way is to consider the bills in their regular order, so that we may all know just what is coming up and be prepared on each question that is presented.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us begin with the bills now.

Mr. BECK. I do not care where we begin, so that we proceed in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. A resolution now lies on the table to take up the Calendar and to consider unobjected cases, as we have done for several sessions.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. ANTHONY on the 3d instant:

Resolved, That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day, after ——, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, and continue such consideration until half past one o'clock; and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless, upon motion, the Senate shall at any time otherwise order; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I presume the Senator from Rhode Island intended to exclude appropriation bills. Whenever they may be ready, they ought to be taken up at any time.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the unwritten law of the Senate, that an appropriation bill always comes up when it is ready.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And it is the general understanding that those bills are excepted from the resolution just reported?

Mr. ANTHONY. That understanding always prevails.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In my opinion there is no necessity for the adoption of a limitation on debate at the present time. We have not progressed so far in the business of the session now as to apply a five-minute rule to debate on bills and resolutions on the Calendar. I have no objection to adopting the other part of the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island, but it seems to me that it is too early to limit debate on these questions; and it should never be done unless there is absolute necessity for it. Toward the close of the session there is apparent necessity to limit debate when we proceed with business on the Calendar; but we are now comparatively at the early part of the session. I do not think it is wise to apply that rule to the matters that are now upon the Calendar, and which are not very many.

Mr. ANTHONY. That rule applies only to the unobjected cases on the Calendar, so as to relieve the Calendar from the unobjected cases. There are a great many bills that no Senator objects to, but they are kept back in their order by disputed cases. If we once relieve the Calendar of unobjected cases, we can then go through with it in its order without any limitation of debate. That is the purpose of the proposed rule. It has been applied several sessions and has been found to work very well, I think, with the general approbation of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I did not understand that we might after a bill was taken up object; but I am now informed that the construction given to the rule is that we may object at any time.

Mr. ANTHONY. At any time during the proceeding.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That alters the case.

Mr. WHYTE. The time when it shall commence to operate ought to be stricken out.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will strike out the words "after ——."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That modification will be made.

Mr. WHYTE. And insert "forthwith."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, and continue such consideration until half past one o'clock; and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless, upon motion, the Senate shall at any time otherwise order; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

Mr. BECK. That accomplishes substantially what I desired when I made the objection, so that the Senate can see precisely, by following the Calendar, what cases are coming up. That is all I care about.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes the Senator from Rhode Island means "the Calendar of General Orders?"

Mr. ANTHONY. The Calendar of General Orders.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to an inconvenience that will result under this rule from the practice of having the Calendar printed but once a week. By some order of the Senate that I have never heard explained, we have a Calendar of current business printed every Monday. Cases are continually going off by the action of the Senate and coming on by reports from committees. It is impossible for any person to know what is the condition of the current business unless we have a calendar every morning. The form is undoubtedly in print at the printing-house, and would require but very little alteration to adapt it to the current business from day to day. I do not know whether a motion would be necessary or not. I presume a suggestion from the Vice-President would suffice to have this carried into effect; but if a motion is necessary I should like to move that a calendar of general orders be prepared every day for the use of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the suggestion a very proper one, and in the absence of objection will direct the Secretary to have a daily calendar prepared.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is no objection to that; but our habit bas been to have the Clerk resume the call at the place left off on the Calendar, and the new cases go to the foot always.

The VICE-PRRSIDENT. Under the resolution just adopted, the Secretary will proceed to call the Calendar of General Orders, commencing at the beginning with bills.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE AT ELECTIONS.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 554) to prohibit military interference at elections.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to the consideration of that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SPRUILLE BRADEN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 125) to appoint Spruille Braden an ensign in the United States Navy.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to that also.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

TREATY OF RECIPROCITY WITH FRANCE.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) providing for a treaty of reciprocity and commerce with the Republic of France.

Mr. BOOTH. I object.

Mr. COCKRELL. That joint resolution has never been referred to a committee. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

USE OF TROOPS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 621) authorizing the employment of the militia and the land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Mr. TELLER. Has that been to a committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been referred.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that it be passed over for the present. The Senator who introduced it is not present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

THOMAS WORTHINGTON.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 15) requiring the assembling of a court of inquiry in the case of Thomas Worthington.

Mr. TELLER Let that be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The consideration of the joint resolution is objected to.

A. R. POTTS AND C. F. RAINEY.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 120) to pay A. R. Potts and C. F. Rainey for services in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That matter, I believe, is before the Committee on Appropriations and under consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, then, that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as it never has been referred.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I desire to make an inquiry. I have heard it said that several bills and resolutions were on the Calendar which had not come from committees. How does it happen that they are there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They have not been referred, but simply introduced without a reference.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I thought it was usual (and I think that has been the case heretofore, but I may be mistaken) not to put upon the Calendar a bill until it was reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Where it has been read the second time, and not referred to a committee, the rule requires it to go on the Calendar. There are several bills in the position which have been read twice without a reference. This seems to be one of them.

WILLIAM B. WHITING.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 751) granting a pension to William B. Whiting.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that pass over.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill has been reported from the Committee on Pensions, and has once been debated at considerable length. It was laid over for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Missouri, I think, to satisfy himself further as to some action that he desired to ascertain from the Pension Bureau. I should like to have the case considered.

Mr. COCKRELL. When we come to the Calendar again I shall be ready to discuss the question, but I cannot do it under the present rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 71) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. That bill will give rise to debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid over.

COMPROMISE OF CLAIMS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 796) to amend section 3469 of the Revised Statutes, relative to offers of compromise of claims in favor of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This bill seems never to have been referred.

Mr. GARLAND. It was referred to the Committee on Finance some time ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal does not show it. It will be noted as referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAYMENT OF DISTRICT WORKINGMEN.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 42) to provide for the speedy payment of the workingmen of the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This resolution appears never to have been referred.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTHERN BOUNDARY OF NEBRASKA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 550) to extend the northern boundary of the State of Nebraska.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope the bill will be taken up. I think there is no opposition to it; I do not know of any, at any rate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read at length.

The bill was read.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] the other day objected to this bill, and until he shall be present I object to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I was not aware that he did object.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think the Senator from Vermont is mistaken about his colleague objecting. It was the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] who objected, and he has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The only objection I heard made was by the Senator from Minnesota, who lives near to this tract of country. I should be glad to hear from him.

Mr. MCMILLAN. So far as I am concerned I did interpose an objection at the time the Senator called up the bill before, under the apprehension that the passage of the bill might affect some of my constituents. I have since been advised that that is not the case, and so far as I am concerned I have no objection to interpose. I know nothing of the merits of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska how much additional territory this proposed bill will attach to his State?

Mr. SAUNDERS. A country about forty miles in length, and I should say eight or ten miles on the average in width. It is to straighten our line, to carry it to the forty-third parallel, and run it through to the Missouri River. It is to straighten the line between the Territory of Dakota and the State of Nebraska. It covers some twenty odd townships of land. I do not know exactly the amount.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understand that the Delegate in the House representing that Territory assents to the changed line.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There is no objection anywhere that I know of. I do not know of any one objecting to it.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I doubt the policy of declaring what the Government will do in the event of the occurrence of an unascertained contingency, and I believe I shall object to the consideration of this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

Mr. GARLAND. Before it goes over I wish to state to the Senator from Kansas that the same proposition that he makes now in an objection was made before the committee when this matter was investigated, and I call his attention to the fact that the bill before the Senate conforms, as he will find upon investigation, to a number of precedents of the same sort. The thing has been done several times by the Congress of the United States, and in case of the event not transpiring there is no damage done, no title to the land passes. The bill is only for the purpose of straightening the northern boundary of the State of Nebraska.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator from Kansas will withdraw his objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I insist on the objection, for the present at least.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next bill will be reported.

MILITARY WARRANT LAND LOCATIONS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 19) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This bill has been made a special order for Monday next.

Mr. McDONALD. That is the bill which has been made a special order for Monday next after the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. So it will be passed over.

MONUMENT AT CHALMETTE NATIONAL CEMETERY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 137) to aid the completion of the soldiers and sailors' monument at Chalmette National Cemetery, Louisiana.

The bill was read.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire what sailors and soldiers these are. I should like to know something about the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the report be read.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The report will explain the bill; it is exceedingly short, but I can state in a moment the whole matter. It is this: Belonging to the Government at New Orleans are fifty pieces of refuse granite. It is desired by this association to complete a soldiers' monument. The War Department recommends that the granite be disposed of in the way proposed by the bill, and the Chief of Engineers, to whom application was made, says in substance that the granite is of no use to the Government.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have the report read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. RANDOLPH December 16, 1879:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 137) to aid the completion of the soldiers and sailors' monument at Chalmette National Cemetery, Louisiana, beg leave to submit the following report:

The bill asks for a donation of fifty pieces of refuse granite in and about Fort Livingston, Louisiana, to aid in the completion of the soldiers and sailors' monument at Chalmette National Cemetery, in the State of Louisiana.

The Secretary of War has furnished the committee with the following communication relating to the subject from C. W. Howell, captain of engineers, United States Army, indorsed by General H. G. Wright, Acting Chief of Engineers:

"UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
"New Orleans, May 23, 1879.

"Respectfully returned to the Chief of Engineers with the following information:

"The granite called for in the bill (S. No. 137) consists of old pintle and traverse circle blocks of obsolete pattern.

"The only use it could be put to, in case Fort Livingston should ever be remodeled to adapt it for a modern armament, would be use in making concrete.

"It can be used to advantage in the Chalmette monument, as I know from having had the design and working drawings of the latter executed under my directions.

"I am informed by the monument committee that they now have money enough to complete the monument, with the exception of bronzes, provided the United States will donate this stone.

"I would respectfully recommend that they be permitted to use it.

"C. W. HOWELL,
"Captain of Engineers, United States Army.

"OFFICE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
"Washington, May 28, 1879.

"Respectfully returned to the honorable the Secretary of War, inviting attention to the preceding indorsement, which is approved by me. The stone is of little value for the purposes of the work at Fort Livingston.

"H. G. WRIGHT,
"Acting Chief of Engineers."

As the bill receives the indorsement and approval of the Engineer Department of the United States Army and is concurred in by the Secretary of War, the committee recommend its passage.

Mr. TELLER. What I wanted to find out I have not learned from the report. I want to know what sailors these are and what soldiers we are building a monument to. I want to know in what war they served, when they served, and I think I will inquire on which side they served.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the committee did not deem it within its province, nor did it know of any occasion to ask that question when the matter came before it. I cannot answer the Senator; I cannot say whether these be Federal or confederate soldiers. The question did not come up in the committee. The only way to ascertain the facts will be to return the whole of these communications to the War Department and obtain from it the reasons for its recommendation.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if he knows of any national cemetery erected and maintained at the expense of the General Government over the bodies of the slain confederates?

Mr. TELLER. I do not.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is a national cemetery, belonging to the Government, over the soldiers of the Union and the sailors of the Union.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is true.

Mr. TELLER. I do not learn it from the report of the committee, nor am I able to learn from any member of the committee that this donation goes to a national cemetery. It goes to certain individuals by name. I think the committee could afford to give us a little information on this subject. If they cannot, I will object to the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next case on the Calendar.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I have just entered the Chamber, and I am informed that Senate bill No. 137 being under consideration, it has been objected to by the Senator from Colorado. If I am correctly informed, I ask the Senator from Colorado to withdraw his objection. This bill, I think, is undoubtedly proper. It is intended simply to give to an association incorporated under the laws of Louisiana the right to use certain granite for building a monument in Chalmette Cemetery, a Union national cemetery wherein are buried hundreds of Union soldiers and sailors. I do not think there can be any objection to the bill, justly, from any quarter. These pieces of granite are worthless to the Government at the present time. I believe they are at Fort Livingston, or were, and it is desired simply to utilize them in building this monument.

Mr. TELLER. The language of the bill, as I stated before, is a donation to individuals; and if the object is to donate the granite for the purpose of erecting a monument in a national cemetery it should have been asserted in the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. These individuals are the incorporators.

Mr. TELLER. These parties become proprietors of it.

Mr. KELLOGG. They are incorporated under the laws of Louisiana.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the next bill.

THE TENTH CENSUS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 885) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for taking the tenth and subsequent censuses," approved March 3, 1879; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, by the instruction of the Committee on the Census, I desire to move a substitute for this bill, one which contains all the provisions of the bill and one or two additional sections; and with the permission of the Senate, I will make a brief statement as to the objects and purposes of the measure.

Section 1 provides that all mail matter received by the Census Bureau shall, upon the use of official envelopes, be transported free through the post-office. As the law now stands, it is only the matter which goes out from the Census Office which is transported free.

The second section provides that there shall be a change of schedules in this respect; that an inquiry shall not be made as to whether foreign-born inhabitants are naturalized citizens or remain aliens. The reason for that is that the experience heretofore had shows that the returns are extremely unsatisfactory, for the reason that naturalization is frequently a judicial question, and cannot be determined readily by those who give information as to the number of persons in the house.

The next provision is that the returns for the fiscal year of certain railroad and other companies shall be made as of the date next nearest to the 1st of June, 1880; and the reason for that provision is that many of the fiscal years of corporations end in July, August, and September, and, as the law now stands, the particulars reported would only relate really to the second year before that in which the census is taken.

Section 4 requires that the enumeration in cities of a certain class shall be completed in two weeks, rather than in four, which is given in the original law.

Section 5 provides that wherever it shall be found impossible in an enumeration district to find a person competent and willing at the salary which is to be given to undertake to perform the duties of the office, the selection may be made throughout the county in which the enumeration district exists.

Section 6 provides that after the enumeration is completed in the enumeration district, a list of the inhabitants shall be set up in a conspicuous place provided for that purpose, and that objections to the list, either that it does not contain all the inhabitants or that in other respects it is wrong, shall be heard.

The seventh section imposes the obligation upon the part of supervisors to provide that a copy of the return which is sent to the Census Bureau here shall be sent to the office of the secretary of state of the respective States.

Section 8 contains an additional appropriation of $350,000, or as much of that sum as may be necessary, to cover the additional copies which are required by this bill to be made, and also the expense of the enumerators in receiving objections to their reports.

The Senate will perceive, as I have stated the provisions of this substitute, that they relate merely to the machinery by which the census is to be taken, and the committee were unanimously of the opinion that they would add to the efficiency of the service. I might also say, although that perhaps is not very important, that the bill as it now stands met the concurrence, and indeed was suggested to the committee by the Superintendent of the Census. I move this as a substitute for the original bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and insert what will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

That all mail matter of whatever class, relative to the census and addressed to the Census Office, to the Superintendent, his chief clerk, supervisors or enumerators, and indorsed, "Official business, Department of the Interior, Census Office," shall be transported free of postage; and if any person shall make use of any such indorsement to avoid the payment of postage on his private letter, package, or other matter in the mail, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine of $300, to be prosecuted in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. That the seventeenth section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the taking of the tenth and subsequent censuses" be amended by striking out so much thereof as provides that schedule 1 contain an inquiry as to the naturalization of foreign-born persons, and that schedule 4 contain an inquiry relating to the ownership of the public debt of the United States, by whom owned, and the respective amounts.

SEC. 3. That section 17 of the act aforesaid be so amended as to allow the report which the Superintendent of the Census is required to obtain from railroad corporations, incorporated express companies, telegraph companies, and insurance companies to be made for the fiscal year of the incorporation or company having its termination nearest to the 1st of June, 1880.

SEC. 4. That section 19 of the aforesaid act shall be amended so as to require the enumeration to commence upon the 1st day of June, 1880, and further so as to require that the enumeration of population in cities having over ten thousand inhabitants shall be taken within two weeks from the 1st day of June, 1880.

SEC. 5. That section 5 of the act aforesaid shall be amended so as to allow that in case it shall occur in any enumeration district that no person qualified to perform and willing to undertake the duties of enumerator resides in that district, the supervisor may appoint any fit person, resident in the county, to be the enumerator of that district.

SEC. 6. That section 9 of the act aforesaid be, and the same hereby is, so amended as to require each enumerator, immediately after completing the enumeration of the population of his district and before forwarding the same to the supervisor, to make and file in the office of the clerk of the county court or in the office of the court or board administering the affairs of the county to which his district belongs a list of the names, with age, sex, and color, of all persons enumerated by him, which he shall certify to be true, and for which he shall be paid at the rate of ten cents for each one hundred names. He shall give notice by written advertisement at three or more public places in his district that he will be at the court-house of said county on the fifth day after filing said list, not including Sunday, from nine o'clock a. m. to six o'clock p. m. and the following day for the purpose of correcting his enumeration by striking out or adding the designation of persons improperly enumerated or omitted; and on the days so designated he shall, in accordance with said notice, proceed to correct, on such reliable information as he may obtain, all omissions and mistakes in such enumeration, and to that end he may swear and examine witnesses, who shall testify subject to the pains and penalties of perjury. The result of such inquiry for correction and the whole number of persons by him enumerated he shall make known to the bystanders, if any. And the time given enumerators by said act to make return to supervisors is hereby extended fifteen days; and within five days from the expiration of the time given for correcting his schedule of inhabitants each enumerator shall make a full, true, and perfect copy of all schedules made by him, which he shall forward with the original as duplicate returns to the supervisor of his district in such time and manner as the supervisor may direct, and for the copy of schedules required he shall receive compensation at the rate of ten cents a page. And each enumerator shall be paid for his services in correcting his schedule of inhabitants as required by this act a sum to be fixed by the Superintendent of Census, in no case to exceed $2.50 per day. And that the oath of office prescribed by section 7 of said act be so amended as to authorize and require the making and filing the list of inhabitants as required by this act.

SEC. 7. That section 5 of said act be, and the same hereby is, so amended as to require each supervisor of census to forward one of the two sets of returns received from the enumerators to the Census Office at Washington, and to file the other in the office of the secretary of state of the State or Territory to which his district belongs.

SEC. 8. That to pay the enumerators for the additional services required by this act the sum of $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear from the chairman of the committee as to the advisability of the change proposed in section 4, which provides that section 19 of the original act shall be amended so as to require that the enumeration of population in cities having over ten thousand inhabitants shall be taken within two weeks from the 1st day of June, 1880, the original section providing, if I recollect aright, that that enumeration should be made in four weeks.

I am not very familiar with the terms of the original act, but if I recollect aright the enumerators or subordinate officers under the supervisors are limited to four thousand inhabitants; that is, there is an enumerator for every four thousand people. Then, in cities having over ten thousand there would be, say, an average of three enumerators, which would give them twelve working days in which to take down all the statistics provided for in the original section, which would require about fifteen hundred a week, not less than that, or from two hundred and fifty to three hundred every working day. I doubt exceedingly whether it is in the power of the men who will be likely to be appointed enumerators to prepare the statistics provided for in the original act within the period named in this section. If three hundred names, with all the necessary statistics in regard to them as to birth and property and whatever else may be necessary, are to be taken within each working day, I doubt if it can be done; and unless the chairman of the committee has some positive information on this subject, I should hope that the Senate would not agree to that amendment. Of course the great object of the census is accuracy and fidelity. I can see no reason why the amendment should be made. The time provided in the original act was adopted after mature deliberation, and I think corresponds with the time adopted in the previous censuses. I can see no object to be attained by this reduction, and it appears to me to be very doubtful whether it would be possible to perform the labor within the period prescribed.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I can only say in reference to the objection made by the Senator from Kansas that the effort has been to make the census as complete as possible within the briefest possible time. It would be desirable if it were possible to take it upon one particular day. That was not found to be advisable, although it could undoubtedly be done if a sufficient expenditure were made. If it were thought that the advantage of taking it all on one day would be equivalent to the very great expense which would be necessary, it should be done.

As the Senator has well said, in cities of ten thousand population there will be three enumerators; and three enumerators will be sufficient to take the census of inhabitants, inasmuch as under the law as it now exists much of the duty which was devolved upon the deputy marshals under the former law, deputy marshals then being the enumerators, has been taken from them, and statistics other than those of mere population have been devolved upon other instrumentalities for collection.

The suggestion as to the two weeks met with the approval of the Superintendent of the Census, whose desire has been to stimulate the greatest possible activity in making the enumeration. He believes that it is entirely feasible in cities of that population to require this to be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Kansas to submit an amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir, I offer no amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio as a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN TRUST FUNDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 605) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment.

The bill was read.

Mr. PENDLETON. By the direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I move a substitute for this bill. It will be remembered that when this bill was up for discussion the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] made objection to the phraseology of the bill and to the provisions as to the funds which were to be deposited and the interest that was to be paid. The Committee on Indian Affairs have redrafted the bill and endeavored to meet the objections of both those Senators, and I think there can be no objection to the bill as it now stands.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to deposit, in the Treasury of the United States, any and all sums now held by him, or which may hereafter be received by him, as Secretary of the Interior and trustee of various Indian tribes, on account of the redemption of United States bonds, or other stocks and securities belonging to the Indian trust fund, and all sums received on account of sales of Indian trust lands, and the sales of stocks lately purchased for temporary investment, whenever he is of the opinion that the best interests of the Indians will be promoted by such deposits, in lieu of investments; and the United States shall pay interest semi-annually, from the date of deposit of any and all such sums in the United States Treasury, at the rate per centum stipulated by treaties or prescribed by law, and such payments shall be made in the usual manner, as each may become due, without further appropriation by Congress.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will state also that there is a report accompanying this bill which explains fully all its provisions and the conditions of the Indian trust funds.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. While I shall not object to the bill, I call attention to the fact that there is a provision there which appears to me ought not to be. By a practice, continued perhaps from the beginning of the Government, we have now reached a stage where one hundred, or more, appropriations are paid out, without coming before Congress, each year; consequently Congress has no knowledge of the amounts appropriated or how large they are. Aside from interest on the public debt, there are now, perhaps, between fifty and one hundred millions of dollars going out of the Treasury annually in this way, without the supervision of Congress; and the amount has been very much larger in previous years. I think where there are trust funds there should be a regular appropriation for them; and it appears to me that we ought not to continue the system of making appropriations now for the generations to come. They ought to be supervised and looked over, and carefully considered by each and every Congress, and the provisions of this bill will prevent that. There has been, and is still, a very large number of such appropriations, commencing almost with the beginning of the Government and running down to the present day. A committee of the Senate has been charged with the duty of looking into and reporting to the Senate what they are, their amount and number, and I think it will astonish the Senate when it learns of their vast amount.

Now, I hope the Senator from Ohio, upon this suggestion which I make, will change that feature of the bill, and let this matter be appropriated for as all other things are, as the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court and all other officers are, and as all other items for carrying on the Government are. It would be better if Congress would pass no appropriation permanent in its nature; we had better supervise each item every year. Let the appropriations come before Congress regularly, and let Congress know, from year to year, what they are appropriating. I hope the Senator will change that part of the bill. With that change, I certainly have no objection to it.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is a matter which was considered in the committee that reported the bill. It was thought inasmuch as these amounts are guaranteed by treaty and by permanent law, the appropriation might as well be made permanent as to be made annually. If the system that the Senator alludes to shall hereafter become general, if the bill he is preparing shall hereafter be made a law, and it be thought advisable to repeal this portion of this law, it can be done. I hope the bill will pass as it was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio who reported this bill what funds are in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. PENDLETON. I will tell the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I supposed they were in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have the report here.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I believe the law requires them to be deposited with the Treasurer.

Mr. PENDLETON. They are in the possession of the Treasury of the United States, but they are only there as a mere custodian of the bonds. That Department has no legal authority over them except to hold them subject to the order of the Secretary of the Interior. The inducement to the law of 1875 was that inasmuch as the vaults, safes, and other receptacles in the Treasury were much more safe than those in the Interior Department, and especially after the fire occurred, they should be transferred to the Treasury for safe-keeping.

Mr. GARLAND. Did I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that there was a report accompanying this bill?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARLAND. Has it been printed?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir; Senate report No. 186, made by me within a few days past.

Mr. GARLAND. When the bill was up some time since there were several objections to it raised at that time; among others the Senator from Vermont objected. I do not see him in his seat this morning. This is a very important bill; a bill that has several serious questions in it. When it was before the Senate a year ago or more, there was a petition filed by the delegate of the Chickasaw Nation of Indians, printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, raising these objections to the bill:

> Your petitioner objects to having their trust fund covered into the Treasury, as this bill proposes, on the following grounds:
> 1. It is a plain violation of their treaties as hereinbefore set out. The Chickasaw treaty requires that their funds "shall constantly be kept invested in safe and profitable stocks."
> 2. From experience and observation we fear that when our funds are once covered into the Treasury we will never be able to get them out should any great calamity befall our people requiring a use of some portion of these funds.
> 3. We fear that Congress might at some time fail to appropriate our interest on these funds.

These are three very serious objections to the bill, and I have some statements in my possession from other Indians interested in this matter. The report I do not think has been spread on the desks of Senators; at least I have not had an opportunity of seeing it; and I would ask the Senator who has charge of the bill to consent that it may go over until we have time to examine it.

Mr. PENDLETON. Allow me to ask the Senator from Arkansas what tribes have remonstrated?

Mr. GARLAND. This remonstrance is from Mr. Overton, delegate of the Chickasaw Nation of Indians. He makes a statement, too, of the different funds of his tribe.

Mr. PENDLETON. Will the Senator read it?

Mr. GARLAND. The investments?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes.

Mr. GARLAND. This was a year ago. On page 3 of his remonstrance this appears:

Stocks.	Per cent.	Original amount.	Amount of abstracted bonds not provided for by Congress.	Amount on hand.	Annual interest.
CHICKASAW NATIONAL FUND.
State of Arkansas	6			$168,000 00	$10,080 00
State of Maryland	6			8,350 17	501 01
State of Tennessee	6			616,000 00	36,960 00
State of Tennessee	5½			66,666 66⅔	3,500 00
State of Virginia, (Richmond and Danville Railroad)	6			100,000 00	6,000 00
United States, registered, act of March 3, 1865	6			550 95	33 06
United States, funded, loan of 1881	5			206,099 70	10,305 00
Total				1,165,667 48⅔	67,379 07
CHICKASAW INCOMPETENTS.
State of Indiana	5			2,000 00	100 07

Mr. PENDLETON. The Senator will allow me to say, in answer, that this bill does not affect any of those funds that are enumerated there except the United States funded loan of 1881. It provides simply that the funds arising from the redemption of United States bonds, funds arising from the sale of Indian lands, and funds arising from the proceeds of temporary investments, shall be paid into the Treasury. It does not affect in any degree the State stocks and securities that have heretofore been held. The necessity for the bill, if the Senator will read the report, arises from the fact that the 5 per cent. bonds held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the Indians are now maturing, and some arrangement must be made for the investment of the funds, for the law requires all the investments to be made at 5 per cent. The report, if the Senator will take the trouble to look at it, accompanying this bill recites:

> The necessity for the passage of this bill is to be found in the fact that some of the 5 per cent. bonds of the United States, which were held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the Indian tribes, have been called in and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, and under the law no authority exists for the investment of the money so realized.

The Senator will observe that the bill is limited to funds arising from the three sources, redemption of United States bonds, sale of Indian lands, and the proceeds of a mere temporary investment; and I will say to the Senator further that this bill was drawn expressly with reference to the objections made by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from New York, and when I reported the modified bill I stated in the hearing of both those gentlemen that it was intended to obviate the objections they had made to the former bill.

Mr. GARLAND. I dare say if I had read the report, which I have not, (and I have it now for the first time in my hand,) I should concur with the Senator in his view of the bill; but this report was made on the 2d, only three days since. It is probably my own fault that I have not read it, but in the multitude of other duties it has entirely escaped me. In that view I do not want to be put in the category of objecting to the Senate considering anything; I do not want to make an objection; but I request that it go over.

Mr. PENDLETON. I certainly shall not object to a reasonable request made by the Senator from Arkansas, although I believe it was at his request that I allowed the bill to go over before.

Mr. GARLAND. It was; and I state now that I have not before seen the report, which was made only three days since.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will accept any suggestion from the Senator as to the temporary disposition of the bill, either asking that it be made a special order or that it go over on the Calendar.

Mr. GARLAND. Let it be passed over informally, so that I can look at it.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask, then, that it be passed over informally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FARLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and seventeen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 170) concerning an international fishery exhibition to be held in Berlin, Germany, in April, 1880.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 325) for the relief of Henry Page;

A bill (S. No. 578) granting an increase of pension to Samuel B. Davis; and

A bill (S. No. 857) authorizing the conversion of national gold banks.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 325) for the erection of a public building at Danville, Virginia.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) to provide for the publication and distribution of a supplement to the Revised Statutes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN T. HARRIS of Virginia, Mr. JOHN B. CLARK of Missouri, and Mr. G. S. ORTH of Indiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. RANDOLPH gave notice that on Wednesday next, after the morning hour, he would call up the bill (S. No. 1139) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, late major-general of the United States Volunteers and colonel of the Army, for consideration.

EDWARD BRADEN AND J. W. ANGUS.

Mr. ROLLINS entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 56) for the relief of Edward Braden and J. W. Angus was passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

CANCELLATION OF PATENT, ETC.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform this House—

1. The reasons for the cancellation of the patent issued to Thomas McBride, on the 26th day of September, 1877, for one hundred and sixty acres of land in Grantsville, in the Territory of Utah, which cancellation occurred on the 10th day of October, 1879, or thereabout.

2. The number of incorporated cities in the Territory of Utah, the population of each, the number of acres of public lands in each city, the number of patents for public lands granted in each city, with the amount of lands thus granted.

3. Whether there are any facts within his knowledge tending to show that these incorporated cities, or any of them, have been organized with the intent to prevent persons desiring to settle in Utah from obtaining any of the public lands within the corporate limits thereof.

4. Has there been in the Interior Department, heretofore, any discrimination in issuing patents for public lands in these cities of Utah in favor of Mormons and against other persons.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the petition accompanying that resolution printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The petition will go into the petition-box.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Very well, sir.

PUBLIC BUILDING, DANVILLE, VIRGINIA.

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Speaker, I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 325) for the erection of a public building at Danville, Virginia, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, for the purpose of moving concurrence in those amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read, when the Speaker will ask whether there is objection to their present consideration.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Line 5, strike out "sixty" and insert "seventy," and after the word "dollars" insert the following:

"To be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall procure the site and cause proper plans and estimates to be made so that no expenditure shall be made or authorized for the full completion of said building beyond the sum hereby appropriated, on a site at least sixty feet removed from any other building."

So the bill will read:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed at Danville, Virginia, a building for the accommodation of the circuit and district courts of the United States, the post-office, and internal-revenue officers, at a cost not exceeding $70,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury," &c.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. CABELL. I move to concur in those Senate amendments.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CABELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONVERSION OF NATIONAL GOLD BANKS.

Mr. CRAPO. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 857) authorizing the conversion of national gold banks, in order that it may be considered at this time. The bill has already been considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency and its passage has been unanimously recommended by that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill, and the same will be read.

The bill, which was read, provides that any national gold bank organized under the provisions of the laws of the United States may, in the manner and subject to the provisions prescribed by section 5154 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for the conversion of banks incorporated under the laws of any State, cease to be a gold bank, and become such an association as is authorized by section 5133, for carrying on the business of banking, and shall have the same powers and privileges, and shall be subject to the same duties, responsibilities, and rules, in all respects, as are by law prescribed for such associations: provided that all certificates of organization which shall be issued under this act shall bear the date of the original organization of each bank respectively as a gold bank.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, and accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRAPO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUPPLEMENT TO REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move, Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) to provide for the publication and distribution of a supplement to the Revised Statutes, for the purpose of moving disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and asking a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a memorial of 1,000 citizens of my State, asking that those great lines of commerce which are already constructed, or that may hereafter be constructed, to the border of the Indian country, shall be granted the right to traverse that Territory. In other words, they ask that that Territory shall be no longer an obstruction to the commerce between the different States and Territories.

Although that Indian country is the paradise of America, and would make happy and prosperous homes for millions of people in the East who are homeless, they do not ask to have that Territory opened to settlement, but simply that it shall no longer be allowed to remain as an impassable barrier to commerce. They are willing that it shall remain the home of the Indians, and they believe the opening of these lines of commerce will in no wise injure any interest of the Indians, but, on the contrary, will prove a civilizing agency.

I therefore ask that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals; and I beg to say to that honorable committee that I hope they will give this petition prompt, early, and favorable consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas, and the petition will be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

SINKING FUND, PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MCLANE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4233) to create a sinking fund for the Kansas Pacific, Sioux City and Pacific, and Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Companies, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

HENRY PAGE.

Mr. GUNTER. I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 325) for the relief of Henry Page.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to credit the account of Henry Page, late agent and disbursing officer of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, with the sum of $904.09, being the amount, with interest, disbursed by him as such officer in good faith to persons falsely producing the discharges of, and identifying themselves as, John West, Alfred Rogers, and Miles Shinn, discharged United States soldiers; and that the proper certificate of credit be issued to said Page, and be received by the United States marshal for the eastern district of Arkansas, in full satisfaction of the judgments against said Page, on account of the aforesaid disbursements, in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas.

Mr. DUNNELL. I should like to ask whether this bill has been considered by any committee of this House.

Mr. GUNTER. It has not, but it has been investigated and reported upon by three several committees of the Senate.

Mr. DUNNELL. How much is involved?

Mr. GUNTER. About nine hundred and odd dollars. I ask that the report of the Senate committee be read, if there be no objection.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not wish to object, but I hope the report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

By the certified copy of the record of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas, it appears that a special verdict was found in favor of the United States against the said Henry Page and his sureties, to the effect that the said Page, as special agent and disbursing officer, received from the United States the sum of $287.50 on the 23d of June, 1868, with instructions to pay the same to Miles Shinn, a discharged soldier of Company G, One hundred and thirteenth United States Colored Troops, and that on the 13th day of July, 1868, the said defendant in good faith paid the same to a person claiming to be Miles Shinn, and who presented the discharge of and was identified as Miles Shinn by J. T. Daniels, but that the person to whom the said sum of money was paid by defendant was not Miles Shinn, and that the said Miles Shinn has never been paid the said sum of money by the defendant.

If upon these facts the court is of opinion that the defendant is liable, then we find for the United States, the plaintiff, the sum of $287.50, with 6 per cent. interest from the 13th day of July, 1868; but if the court is of the opinion that defendant is not liable, then we find for the defendant.

And in another suit of the United States against the said Henry Page a similar special verdict for the sum of $130.32 was found against the defendant, subject to the opinion of the court. And also in the case of John West.

Upon the question of the liability of the defendant thus reserved, Judges Dillon and Caldwell divided in opinion, and filed a certificate of division of opinion, so that the case should be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States; but it appears that the petitioner was wholly unable for want of means to carry this case, involving a sum less than $1,000, to the Supreme Court of the United States, by reason of the expense.

It appears by the certificate of Charles C. Waters, United States attorney for the eastern district of Arkansas, whose statements are indorsed by Henry C. Caldwell, the district judge before whom the suits against Page by the United States were tried, that Page had been engaged for a considerable time as disbursing officer, and large sums of public money, amounting in the aggregate to several millions of dollars, had passed through his hands and been faithfully accounted for; and that the payments to the persons falsely personating the three discharged soldiers in question were made by him in perfect good faith and by the absolute perjury of apparently credible witnesses, and that Page was the victim of a conspiracy which it is difficult to see how he could have avoided.

In view, therefore, of the circumstances of the case, the special verdicts of the juries, and certificate of the district attorney who prosecuted and the district judge before whom the cases were tried, all expressly exonorating Mr. Page from any bad faith in these transactions, and attesting his long and faithful performance of duty in receiving and disbursing millions of the public money, we consider his case meritorious and that his prayer for relief should be granted, and accompany this report with a bill for his relief.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, and accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GUNTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAKE NEAR COUNCIL BLUFFS.

Mr. SAPP, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1064) to grant to the corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, for public uses, a certain lake or bayou near said city; and the bill and accompanying report were ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR CHANDLER.

On motion of Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. No. 75) to print the eulogies in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Zachariah Chandler was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

LANDS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Territories be, and are hereby, instructed to report no bill looking to or providing for the organization of any Territory out of any of the land embraced in the lands known as the present Indian Territory, excepting so much of said Territory as lies east of the ninety-seventh degree of longitude.

KANSAS JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Mr. HASKELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4234) to divide the district of Kansas into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN B. DAVIS.

Mr. MONEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3758) for the relief of John B. Davis, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

SPECIAL-REQUEST ENVELOPES.

Mr. MONEY also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3413) concerning special-request envelopes, and moved that the same be laid upon the table and that the accompanying report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

VAN B. BOWERS.

No. 3132) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Ohio; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM B. HIRNBACH.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4238) for the relief of William B. Hirnbach, late private in Company G, One hundred and sixteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MARGARET M'ELROY.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4239) granting a pension to Margaret McElroy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. O'CONNOR also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4242) requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the current interest upon all registered bonds of the United States without respect to the date of assignment or transfer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

SILVER CERTIFICATES.

Mr. O'CONNOR also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4243) making silver certificates receivable at the Treasury of the United States in redemption of the circulating notes of issue of the national banks; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL B. DAVIS.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 578) granting a pension to Samuel B. Davis. This is a meritorious case, and I hope there will be no objection to the bill being considered at this time.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel B. Davis, of Company C, Eighteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and pay him the pension now allowed by law to those who have lost both an arm and a leg.

Mr. HOSTETLER. Let the report of the Senate committee be read.

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, having examined the bill (S. No. 578) granting an increase of pension to Samuel B. Davis, Company C, Eighteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and the papers accompanying, find that said soldier was pensioned

March 3, 1873, at the rate of $18 per month, for anchylosis of the ankle and elbow joints, the result of disease contracted in the service. The disability having increased, the pension was subsequently rated at $24 per month, commencing March 3, 1873. Application is now made for an increase to $36 per month, on the ground that the disability is so great as to entitle the pensioner to the same rate allowed by law for the loss of a leg and an arm. The affidavits of Merlin L. Hall, M. D., and Lewis Shepard, M. D., filed in the case, appear to establish the fact, as they depose that the left ankle is completely anchylosed, with great enlargement of bony structure around the joint, and the whole limb atrophied and shrunken to a degree that renders it entirely useless, and a source of suffering and inconvenience; that the right elbow-joint is also anchylosed, with atrophy of the muscles of the arm, and anchylosis of the bones of the hand, with consequent inability to close the fingers, rendering hand and arm entirely useless.

The committee, therefore, recommend the passage of Senate bill No. 578, with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. COFFROTH. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman who has taken charge of the bill is a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. COFFROTH. It has not been before that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COFFROTH] is too late in making his objection. The report has been read, which is in the nature of considering the bill.

Mr. COFFROTH. I understood the objection could come in at any time before consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been considered. There was no reservation of the right to object. If the gentleman had reserved his right to object, then he could have made his objection at any time. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOSTETLER] as a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and there was no objection.

Mr. COFFROTH. I came in while the bill was being read.

The SPEAKER. The bill was read and the report has been read; and the Chair regards that as being in the nature of considering the bill.

Mr. COFFROTH. I came in while the bill was being read and waited until the report should be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman waited too long.

Mr. COFFROTH. I think these bills ought to go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I have not, of course, any objection to this particular bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman has no objection to the passage of this bill, but gives notice that hereafter he will object to bills being passed without being considered by the proper committee.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOSTETLER] yield for that purpose?

Mr. HOSTETLER. The only objection I have to the reference——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to test the sense of the House on ordering the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I think this is a very meritorious bill and one which ought to pass. It has been carefully considered by the Senate, and it seems to me there is no good reason why it should be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is always liberally inclined to give every opportunity for the passage of pension bills.

Mr. COFFROTH. I do not know anything about the bill; but I do not want to establish the precedent of taking bills from the Speaker's table and passing them without reference to the proper committees.

The SPEAKER. That is often done in regard to pension bills.

Mr. BROWNE. And it is right.

The SPEAKER. The bill having been read, and the report having also been read, the reading of the report being in the nature of an argument in favor of the passage of the bill, and to that extent constituting a consideration of the bill, the objection to the consideration of the bill, which should have been made immediately upon its reading, is now too late.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I move the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 101, noes 13.

No further count being called for, the bill was passed.

Mr. HOSTETLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CLAFLIN, for four days, on account of important business.

CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. HARRIS of Virginia, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and Mr. ORTH of Indiana as the conferees on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon Senate joint resolution No. 19, to provide for the publication and distribution of a supplement to the Revised Statutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, his Secretary, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 582) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Columbus, Ohio, and transferring certain counties from the northern to the southern district in said State;

An act (H. R. No. 3034) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Macon, Georgia, and to transfer certain counties from the northern to the southern district in said State;

An act (H. R. No. 3108) amending the charter of the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 145) authorizing certain printing for the land commission; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour will now begin at fifteen minutes before one o'clock. The business pending at the close of the morning hour yesterday was the bill (H. R. No. 4219) to amend sections 1, 2, 3, and 10 of the act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1875. Upon this bill the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLITS] is entitled to the floor, having used ten minutes of his time during the morning hour of yesterday.

Mr. WILLITS. When the morning hour closed yesterday I was commenting on the amendment which strikes out the right to bring suits in the United States courts on assigned promissory notes, thereby restoring the law as it was prior to the act of March 3, 1875. I need not make any extended remarks on the evils that have arisen under the law as it now is. Suffice it to say that under it great injustice has been done in what are called patent-right cases, or notes given for patent rights, in nominally assigning in innumerable instances causes of action to citizens of other States than the one in which the contract was made or in which the defendant resides, for the express purpose of their prosecution in the Federal courts. In all these cases the cause is on the removal more than half won by the plaintiff, and in many instances the cause is wholly won by reason of the different constructions of the law given by the State and Federal courts. In my judgment the assigned contract should have the same tribunal that the unassigned contract would have. Section 2 of the bill confers upon defendants the power of removal in all cases of which the United States circuit court has original jurisdiction by section 1. The law of 1789 gave this right of removal to defendants only. The law of 1875 gave it to either party, plaintiff or defendant. This bill takes away the right of a plaintiff to remove his cause. He has selected his forum and let him abide by it.

The only changes in section 3 of the act of March 3, 1875, preceding line 126 of this bill, are in reference to the time when the defendant may remove his cause and the amount, to wit, $2,000, requisite for the removal. Under the law as it now stands the party seeking to remove his cause may do so before or at the time at which said cause would be tried and before the trial thereof. This bill proposes to amend the law so that the defendant only may remove his cause, and he may remove it at any time before the defendant is required by the law of the State and the rule of the State court in which said suit is brought to answer or plead to the declaration or complaint. In other words, the time has been changed from any time before the trial to the time when under the State laws the defendant is required to plead to the declaration.

The chief amendment, however, to section 3 is from line 126 to line 140 of the bill. That amendment proposes to take away original jurisdiction or removal of causes between a corporation organized or created by or under the laws of any State and a citizen of a State in which said corporation is doing business, except in cases where the subject-matter authorizes such jurisdiction or removal in suits between citizens of the same State, to wit, when it is a matter of a treaty or a land grant from different States.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment is a radical change of existing law. Under the decision of the Supreme Court a corporation is held to be a citizen of the State in which it is organized or created. The result is that in every State in which it does business, aside from the one in which it is created, the present law authorizes the removal of any case, involving the requisite amount, in which it is a party from the State to the Federal courts. This amendment cuts off that right, and remits the corporation to the State court alone. The evils arising from the existing practice have for a long time been manifest and the subject of great complaint. There seems to be no valid reason why a corporation that competes with local corporations, that goes into every hamlet and almost every household in the land, should not be the subject of State control in that business, and should have the right to remove its causes to a distant court for reasons that differ in no essential degree from the reasons that obtain in other cases. Insurance companies are persistent in seeking risks and money from our citizens; yet in case of loss are hasty in taking their causes to the United States courts, perhaps hundreds of miles away, the expense of which is a practical denial of justice, and the threat of which is used as a basis of an unjust compromise. The proposed amendment cuts this evil up by the roots and remands the parties to the community in which the liability was incurred and in which it was known it would be incurred when the contract was made.

It will be observed that one notable feature in the proposed amendment is the curtailing of the use of the United States courts by corporations. It is astonishing to see the amount of time and labor devoted by these courts to the interests of corporations, to the exclusion of the interests of individual citizens.

Again, a citizen in his individual contests with corporations is turned over to the tender mercies of a litigation which it is ruin for him to incur, but which these corporations with their accumulated capital can sustain. The United States courts have grown to be largely corporation mills, in which the tolls are largely taken from the individual citizen, and generally amount to his whole interest in the grist. So that it has become the fact that the only party or entity which in the United States represents the old feudal system of property tenure, so unanimously opposed by our fathers, transmitted from generation to generation in increasing value and influence, has sought refuge behind the judicial system of a government that boasts it has no primogeniture, and that large estates are divided up by the natural order of things in one or two generations. As a rule this system of transmitting tenure is strong enough if remanded to the State courts; and the expense of individual litigation will be sufficiently onerous in any event. It seems to me a healthy thing to call a halt in the tendency of accumulating legislation, especially of this kind, in the United States courts.

The last amendment proposed in the bill provides for the total repeal of section 640 of the Revised Statutes. I concede that this section ought to be amended; but I am opposed to its absolute repeal. This section substantially provides that all corporations, except banking corporations, organized under a law of the United States, may remove their causes from the State courts to the Federal courts, where the defense is under the Constitution or laws of the United States. It will be conceded, I think, as a general principle that if I have a right under United States law, I ought to have the privilege of having that right construed and enforced by a United States court. If there is a liability imposed upon me by such a law, I have a right to ask that it be expounded by a United States court. If I claim an immunity arising under United States law, I ought to have the privilege of pleading it in a tribunal of the sovereignty which secures me that immunity. I can see no valid reason why a corporation organized and created by United States law should not have the same rights in such regard that an individual has, or ought to have.

But this principle should in my judgment extend no further than to a defense under the law, where the law itself is a defense to the action, and where the defense involves the construction of the law or charter under which the corporation is created. This principle should not apply to the great mass of common-law rights, liabilities, or immunities which are not created by the United States law, but to which even the United States law is subject, and the construction of which in no way depends upon charter rights.

To illustrate: When a railroad corporation has been organized by United States law, all the rights that it gets per se under that law it should have the privilege of having construed by the United States courts; all the liabilities that can be traced directly to the existence of that law should be construed by those courts. Suppose that in the case of a railroad corporation there is no obligation imposed upon it by its charter to fence its road; suppose a State law provides a penalty for not fencing the road; suppose that a train of cars in the regular operation of the business of the road goes through a herd of Texas steers; an action is brought for the injury done to the herd. Now if the charter imposes no obligation upon the company to fence its road, it may be that that would be of itself a defense. Therefore in such an action the corporation ought to have the right to have the immunity which it claims construed by a court of the sovereignty creating it.

Suppose, again, that in the charter of a corporation it should be distinctly stated that for merchandise in transit, in the warehouse of the corporation ready for delivery, the corporation should be liable only as warehousemen, and not as common carriers. Suppose an action should be brought for ten thousand bushels of wheat stored in the warehouse ready for delivery. Now, it might be in such a case that the action at common law might be different from the right of action as it would be under the charter. Therefore the corporation should be entitled to have that charter construed by a United States court, and not by a State court.

But, on the other hand, we will suppose that an injury is done on a passenger train to a passenger for which he claims damages to the amount of $5,000. The simple question of negligence arises, including the question whether there has been contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. This is a case arising under the common law, and therefore, in such a case, I concede the corporation should have no right of removal. In that line of cases where the action is a common-law action, or where the construction of the charter itself is not involved, there should be no removal. In fact the law, as it now stands, seems, in my estimation, to be incongruous, because it provides that there may be a right of removal in cases where there is a defense under the Constitution or any law of the United States. If it was not designed that there should be a "defense" under the law the words "defense under the law" would not have been inserted, but the right of removal would have been made absolute, whether there was any defense under the laws of the United States or not.

But it seems it has been subject to a construction which evades perhaps the force which seems to be given to the word defense in a suit. In a case in 2 Sawyer the United States court decided, where on the showing of the defendant there was no defense under the law of the United States, it was simply a common-law action, and insisted, if it were no more than that and did not involve a construction of a United States law, the case should be remanded back to the State court. In other cases it has been held that inasmuch as the corporation exists only by virtue of the law creating it therefore it has no rights except under that law, and of course any right of action against it must be based upon the law organizing and creating it. It seems to me this section ought to be amended in the way I have suggested, that it should be made imperative upon the defendant to show in his petition for removal wherein and in what respect he has defense arising under the law of the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendment proposed by me covers a case amounting to $2,000 arising under the Constitution or law or treaty made by authority of the United States. A defendant may have the right to remove such a cause from the State to a Federal court, provided he will make it appear to the court in his application that his defense depends on a right construction of some provision of the Constitution or law or treaty of the United States.

Mr. WILLITS. It may be that the gentleman's amendment will cover that. I have not examined it in that respect.

Mr. CULBERSON. So that if section 640 is repealed and wiped out, yet these national corporations will have the same right you suggest they ought to have when defendants, provided my amendment is adopted.

Mr. WILLITS. It may be, but I have not examined the amendment with reference to that. It did not come up in the committee, and I have not examined the subject in that regard, but I do claim this general doctrine that the right conferred by a United States law is a right which should be construed by a United States court, all through, in civil, criminal, and all jurisprudence of the United States. I can consent to no release of that privilege or right. Therefore, as I have said, I am opposed to the absolute repeal of section 640. Whether the amendment of the gentleman from Texas will cover my objection, I am not prepared to say, but I will examine it.

I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WEAVER.]

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I am in hearty accord with the general purpose and scope of this bill. I think there are some verbal amendments and corrections which should be carefully considered by the House when it comes to act upon the bill section by section. I will name one or two of them.

The bill provides that the circuit court shall have cognizance concurrent with the courts of the States where the matter in dispute exceeds $2,000, exclusive of interest and costs. The test, however, of jurisdiction is the allegation in the pleadings. It is within my own personal observation that great injustice has arisen from the plaintiff alleging in his complaint a greater amount than was really due under the contract. It is true the court refuses to award costs in such cases, but that is no redress for such abuses. Litigants are dragged far from their residences to defend against suits of a petty character, and often yield to the grossest injustice rather than incur the expense and inconvenience of attending court at remote points from their homes. The bill should be amended so as to avoid this difficulty.

Then, again, in the first section of the bill I find this provision:

> But no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another in any civil action before a circuit or district court, and no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against any person by any original process or proceeding in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving such process or commencing such proceedings, except as hereinafter provided. And where the controversy is between citizens of different States suit shall be brought only in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant.

The intention of the committee is clear to my mind. It was to provide that suit must be brought in the district in which the defendant resides or in the district in which the plaintiff resides, provided the defendant be found within the plaintiff's district at the time process is served. But the language is not clear. In my opinion great prejudice may arise from the construction of this clause. It may be that a plaintiff residing in the remote northeastern district of Maine can, under this provision, sue a defendant residing at San Francisco, and compel him to appear in the district in Maine to defend. Certainly such is not the intention of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the gentleman will permit me to make a suggestion, I should like to do so.

Mr. WEAVER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Committee on the Judiciary are in entire harmony with the gentleman's own view in that matter. It seeks only to accomplish that which he wishes to have done.

Mr. WEAVER. I understand that. I am not in doubt as to the intention of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. The committee unanimously believe that is strongly done in the bill, but if the gentleman from Iowa thinks it is not, and desires to move an amendment, I suggest that he prepare and submit it somewhat in advance of the vote, so that we may not act hastily on any amendment to this very important bill. If he will do that, the Committee on the Judiciary, I am sure, will be under obligation to him, because they wish to accomplish precisely the same thing.

Mr. WEAVER. I will be glad, Mr. Speaker, to do that. I know that the committee intends what I have indicated. I was only fearful it might be subject to misconstruction, that is all.

To the third section of the bill, from the one hundred and twenty-sixth to the one hundred and fortieth line, I wish to address myself for a few moments. In my judgment this is the important feature in the proposed legislation. I grant you it is a radical change in the practice that has obtained from the earliest decisions under the judiciary act of 1789 down to the present time. Although I am clear that when the act of 1789 was framed and passed, the authors of that important measure did not contemplate that corporations were citizens within the meaning of that act, yet the courts have uniformly, or nearly so, held that the word "citizen" under that portion of the act providing for the removal of causes from the State to the Federal courts, included corporations of various descriptions. Serious abuses have grown up under this judicial construction.

Since the passage of the act of 1789 corporations of every description have sprung up throughout the entire country. Their name is legion. The tendency of the wealth of the country is toward associated capital. Colossal insurance companies, gigantic railroad enterprises, and other and multifarious corporate organizations exist in every locality and permeate every avenue of business life.

Take for illustration a railroad corporation. It is organized, perhaps, under the law of Massachusetts. It stretches its iron arms westward until it reaches the Missouri River, passing through the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and perhaps others. It enters these States, and by the right of eminent domain condemns the property of the citizen, proceeds to build and lay the foundation of a colossal fortune. It builds its road and occupies the territory, and proposes to occupy for all future time.

Now, in contemplation of law this corporation should be held to be a citizen of the State or States, respectively, where it is carrying on or operating its business. They come into a State for the purpose of making money, carrying on transactions with citizens of the State, and why should they not be compelled to go into the State courts, there to adjudicate matters arising between themselves and citizens of the State? They are citizens of the State for all other practical purposes; but when a controversy arises under the law as it now stands the corporation has only to go into the State court and there set forth the fact that it is a foreign corporation, organized under the law of Massachusetts or of some other State, and the cause is removed to the Federal court.

This is a gigantic wrong. An instance of this kind came under my own observation. A citizen of my own county was killed by a railroad train. He was a laboring-man with a large family, earning his living by his daily toil. There was little question in my mind, having investigated the facts, of the liability of the railroad company. His widow brought suit in the State court, but the railroad being a foreign corporation made application for removal, and the case was sent to the Federal court. This had the effect to close the doors of justice to this widow and her children. She was unable to attend or to pay the expenses of attending the Federal court held at a distance of a hundred miles from the place where the injury was inflicted.

There is no substantial reason in the world why that corporation, doing business in that county and State, should not have been compelled to go into the State court and there litigate the matter in controversy. The idea that they are foreign corporations is a mere fiction. They live and move and have their being in the State where they operate their business. There they ply their vocation and meet the people in their daily transactions. But when the citizen asks that his rights shall be respected, that his grievances shall be redressed, then they allege that they are a foreign corporation, and the citizen is dragged off to a forum remote from his home and to which he is a stranger, or he must abandon his rights altogether.

One of the essential elements in the administration of justice in all free countries, Mr. Speaker, is that at all times the citizen shall have the right to be tried, not only for criminal offenses but in respect to his civil rights, by a jury of the vicinage, where he resides, near his home. The construction which has been given to the judiciary act of 1789, however, and the subsequent amendatory acts, have absolutely had the effect to abrogate that sacred right of the citizen, and has placed in the hands of these corporations, and others, powers and privileges never contemplated by the framers of our Government. At the organization of our Government, our fathers had the political chart of the world before them. They undertook to lay broad and deep the foundations of a republic where the power should reside substantially with the great body of the people.

To accomplish that they threw around the cradle of the young Republic certain safeguards. One of these safeguards was that there should be no titles of nobility in this country; another that the right of primogeniture should not obtain here, that there should be no entailed estates, so that the wealth of the country should diffuse itself among the people according to natural and beneficent laws. They did not contemplate the creation of these corporations that are as real entities as are individuals—ideal persons that never die, and yet possess the power to acquire and hold property equally with real persons. They did not, I say, contemplate the rise and progress of these legal Goliaths. Had they foreseen their coming they doubtless would have made ample provision for their restraint.

Sir, their influence in this country to-day is tremendous. They are Briarian monsters, and exceed in ferocity and power any or all of the beasts that John saw in his apocalyptic vision. The Republic itself will have to struggle with them, and no man can now foresee the result of that struggle. The existence of such corporations seem to be necessary to the progress of our civilization; they are inseparable from it; but they should not be clothed by legislation with exclusive privileges over the citizen. The people must put hooks into the jaws of these leviathans, and control them.

The accumulation of capital in the hands of these corporations of itself gives them immense power and tremendous advantage over individuals. But if you, in addition to that, load them with exclusive privileges by law—the privilege of shirking and shunning the ordinary tribunals in which the common people have to litigate their rights—and if you allow them the power and the privilege of dragging the citizen to remote tribunals, then, indeed, you more than double or treble their power. The corporation should seek no exclusive privileges, and the citizen should be just to the corporation. Then all will be harmony.

What objection, Mr. Speaker, can be urged against compelling corporations to come into the State courts? The only one I can imagine is that there is a prejudice in the minds of the people which precludes justice in the State courts. I deny that. If there is prejudice existing to-day in the minds of the people against corporations, it grows out of a deep-seated conviction on their part that the legislation of the country has been in favor of the corporation and against the citizen. Let the citizens of the country know and understand that there are to be no exclusive privileges, that the corporations are simply to go into the State courts and there assert their rights as any other citizen; that of itself will disarm any honest man of prejudice. There should be none. There is no natural cause for any, and that which does exist is the fruit of vicious and class legislation.

There is no such thing as shutting the eye, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that there is a growing tendency to-day in this country to concentration of power in the hands of the few. I do not charge in my remarks that this is the result of any deliberate scheme of legislation; it is not necessary here for me to do so; it is a fact nevertheless. And whenever this Congress or this House has the opportunity to strike down that tendency, and to reduce all classes of citizens to an equal footing, and to remand them to common rights, they should avail themselves of the opportunity.

The third section, Mr. Speaker, embodies in substance House bill No. 1074, introduced by myself on the 21st day of April, 1879, during the extra session. It is substantially that bill. That section meets my hearty approval, as do all the other sections of the bill, with the exception of the verbal criticisms I have named. I will be glad to submit the verbal amendments at the proper time. If I have any time left I yield it back to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLITS] who accorded it to me.

TITLES IN HOT SPRINGS.

Mr. WILLITS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW.]

Mr. NEW. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. DUNN.]

Mr. DUNN. The gentleman from Indiana yields to me that I may ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Public Lands, with the request that the bill and report be printed and recommitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLACKBURN.) That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3549, a bill (H. R. No. 4244) for the establishment of titles in Hot Springs, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill H. R. No. 4219.

Mr. NEW addressed the House. [His remarks, interrupted by the expiration of the morning hour, will be found in full on page 813.]

EULOGIES ON HON. RUSH CLARK, DECEASED.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 200) for printing the eulogies delivered in the Senate and House of Representatives upon Hon. Rush Clark, deceased; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That 9,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Rush Clark be printed; 6,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Clark to accompany the same; and for defraying the expenses of procuring the said portrait the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. This resolution will be referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred accordingly.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL AUGUSTUS P. MARTIN.

Mr. FIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 201) appointing Brigadier-General Augustus P. Martin a manager of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the revision of the rules.

The pending clause was the following:

16. To railways and canals other than Pacific railroads: to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The pending question was upon the following substitute for the clause, offered by Mr. CABELL:

To the improvement of the navigation of rivers, and to railways and canals other than Pacific railroads: to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have submitted proposes simply to restore to the Committee on Railways and Canals that jurisdiction conferred upon it by the existing Rule 94. In behalf of the committee which I represent I ask only that we be left where the old rule, Rule 94, has placed us from 1831 down to the present time. We have not during this discussion asked for any increase of power or jurisdiction for our committee; we simply ask that in the revision of the rules this Committee on Railways and Canals shall not be singled out to have taken from it that jurisdiction which has belonged to it from the time of the organization of the committee as one of the standing committees of the House.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the contest which has heretofore existed between the Committee on Commerce and the Committee on Railways and Canals has been greatly narrowed by the action of the Committee of the Whole in giving to the Committee on Commerce those large and extraordinary powers which for years it has claimed. I am not here to complain of the action of the Committee of the Whole House for doing this. I have nothing but kindness for the Committee on Commerce. I am not unwilling even that that committee shall be clothed with the great powers which have been conferred upon it by the Committee of the Whole since this discussion commenced; but I am not willing that by reason of the fact that new and additional powers have been conferred upon the Committee on Commerce that the rights, the powers, and the jurisdiction belonging to the Committee on Railways and Canals shall be taken from it to satisfy others grasping after power.

I hope no member of this committee will believe we are here asking for any additional powers; that we are asking in any way to extend our jurisdiction. We simply ask that the same jurisdiction which has pertained to this committee for years shall be allowed to remain with it. There is no reason why the jurisdiction should not remain because of the fact that additional powers have been conferred on the Committee on Commerce. It is perhaps true that under the rule as lately framed in relation to the Commerce Committee that committee can now consider and report upon questions bearing upon the navigation of rivers with perhaps as much warrant of authority as can Railways and Canals under the original Rule 94, but I take it that the Committee of the Whole did not mean by its action to prevent the Railway Committee from the legitimate exercise of its functions in regard to subjects of the same or a similar character when referred to it by the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BEALE. Mr. Chairman, I belong to that class of members here who deprecate in this discussion of questions arising upon this report any indication of a political partisanship, and trust that we shall bring to their solution a comprehensive patriotism which will secure that system of rules which will enable us to do the business of legislation smoothly and speedily.

On coming to congress I looked at once to our rules. I found it indeed rudis indigesta moles—a rude, unmethodized mass, and aptly illustrated by some mediæval castle in Europe, to which addition after addition was made as the necessities or whims of its successive owners demanded, and in which none save those who had longest inhabited it could successfully thread the labarynthine passages and stairways which led to its chambers and halls.

As an humble member I return in no stinted measure my thanks to the Committee on Revision of Rules for this reduction of chaos to order; this erection of a modern house more suited to the needs of our day than the old castle; and trust it may be adopted as a monument of our wisdom, long to survive the fluctuation of party ascendency on this floor. A member of the Committees on Commerce and Manufactures now, and in years gone by of that on Militia, I speak in the interest of neither. Indeed, too fond of inglorious ease, looking to the actual present work on Commerce and the prospective labor of Manufactures when indued with powers sketched by the distinguished member from Michigan, and remembering that that grand display of fireworks at Gettysburgh did not awake the Militia Committee from its slumbers, I might adopt the language of Byron and say of the Militia—

> Oh, known the earliest and esteemed the most,
> Dear to a heart where none is left so dear.

In reference to the preceding amendment of my colleague, I must say I have for him and his committee the kindest regard; but Rule 94, adopted in 1831, was still-born; it never lived. Of forty-three bills embracing river improvements referred from 1831 to 1879, thirty-five went to the Committee on Commerce. Again, in 1854, in 1874, and in 1879, this same rule was presented and debated by members of the Committee on Railways and Canals, and each time the House gave the subject to the Committee on Commerce. And good reason for this: you cannot separate the river from the harbor, because the improvement of the river often opens and improves the harbor.

I feel no solicitude for the fate of river and harbor bills, commit them to what committee you may. Next to agriculture as a factor in the sum of the welfare, the happiness, the financial success and national power of the people of this Union, commerce will ever find the friends upon this floor to heed her behests. All highways are a nation's property. True the grand rivers and capacious bays present the noblest collections of the waters of our land; but to these every rill that trickles from the mountain-side, every fount that bubbles in the valley adds its mite; and even so every creek improved, every river deepened, pours its little tribute into the great highways of commerce and advances the general welfare, the highest interests of all.

Mr. FROST. I move the following amendment to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend substitute for section 16 by inserting after the word "rivers," "excepting the Mississippi River and its tributaries;" so it will read:

"To the improvement of the navigation of rivers, excepting the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and to railways and canals, other than the Pacific railroads: to the Committee on Railways and Canals."

Mr. FROST. Mr. Chairman, it is not my fortune to belong to any committee which is directly interested in the question now pending, but it seems to me, after carefully listening to the debate on this floor, it is of the utmost importance to the Mississippi Valley that the substitute proposed should be adopted by this House. I believe that the Committee on Commerce has by far too many subjects now occupying its attention, and that it is unable to give that time and care to the consideration of the Mississippi River and its tributaries which they deserve on account of their magnitude and importance.

I can cite an instance which has recently occurred and which fortifies me in that belief. It so happens that the harbor at Saint Charles, on the Missouri River, is now very seriously endangered by an alteration in the channel of that river. The channel is deflected from the left bank of the river in such manner that it threatens to leave the city of Saint Charles at a distance of several hundred yards and perhaps a quarter of a mile from the river bank. It is taking such a course that it threatens to pass under the bridge in such a position as absolutely to preclude the possibility of any steamboat ascending the Missouri River, thereby closing that river against all navigation whatsoever.

I went this morning, having received letters making this statement, to the able chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who informed me that, owing to the pressure of business before his committee, he would be unable to entertain the consideration of this question for some time to come. But, sir, the people of Saint Charles and the people who are interested in the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers are unable to wait upon the time of the Committee on Commerce in this way. Sir, I wish to make no reflections on that committee. They are laborious and hard-working gentlemen, and they are doing their utmost to keep up with the business brought before them, but it is of such a character that they are unable to do so.

I had no intention of participating in this debate until the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] let fall some remarks which seemed to me to require an answer that it would not be unbecoming in me to attempt. He favored the proposition changing section 3, by which the river and harbor bill was to be reported from the Committee on Commerce for reference to the Committee on Appropriations, and he favored it because he said it was in the interest of economy. He referred with pride to the good old days before the war when he served with the gentleman from Texas—to the times when, he says, there were hardly any appropriations made for internal improvements. There is, sir, an economy which starves the goose which lays the golden egg; there is an economy which is preached abroad in order to cover up prodigality at home. If that is the kind of economy which the gentleman from New York admires, I, for one, love it not.

He tells us, sir, of legislative liberty and pecuniary libertinism. I can match that alliteration, and I can support mine with facts. If I were called upon to define the system which had been adopted in the past with regard to internal improvements, I should call it one of comparative prodigality in the East and parsimony in the West. Prodigality and parsimony are as alliterative and as antithetical as liberty and libertinism, and I can support them, sir, with facts.

In Senate Document No. 12 of the Forty-fifth Congress I find the total expenditure for internal improvements of all kinds from 1789 to 1873 was $207,099,664. Of that amount the Mississippi Valley States received $33,782,662, and the Atlantic and Pacific seaboard $81,300,000, nearly two and a half times as much. The State of New York and the States of New England received $29,000,000, with a population less than half of the Mississippi Valley States; pecuniary libertinism squandered upon them nearly as much money as this entire system received.

We have spent $2,089,730 removing the obstructions at Hell Gate, and but $7,000,000 on the Mississippi River; but when the great West asks for justice at the hands of Congress, the gentleman from New York talks of pecuniary libertinism and invokes the shades of Jefferson and Calhoun and the memory of the purer days of the democracy. Does he not remember that Calhoun, in his report on the Memphis memorial in 1846, advocated liberal appropriations for the Mississippi, an inland sea, as he called it, and its tributaries. I do not wish, sir, to assume the airs of a prophet, but I think I may safely say that whosoever places himself in antagonism to the improvement by the General Government of the waters of the Mississippi Valley will find himself with Buckingham when Dryden says of him, "He left not party, but of it was left." The center of population, if not already there, will shortly take its permanent abode on that "Father of Waters." After the next census that valley will furnish the majority of the members of this House. I trust that they will never manifest a sectional spirit or ignore the just claims of any portion of this Republic; but I am certain that they will be content with nothing short of a full and complete recognition of the importance of the interests which they represent, and that from the day of their predominance here we shall have no parsimony or prodigality or pecuniary libertinism, but a broad, liberal, and enlightened appreciation of the common commercial interests of our common country.

Under both the existing rules and the report now under discussion, the Committee on Commerce makes appropriations for all the rivers and harbors of the country; they bring in an omnibus bill which in the past has frequently contained items of expenditures by no means devoted to objects of a general nature. Objects of a general, national nature, like the Ohio River, are found cheek by jowl with Stone Creek or the Kiskiminetas, unknown to everybody except the gentleman in whose district they may lie. The bill is thus overloaded, and is periodically in danger of being entirely lost; so much of its appropriations going to utterly unworthy objects and so little to those of general importance. Again, gentlemen of the strict constructionist school, and I congratulate my friend from New York as being one of them, are impelled by their principles to vote against such an omnibus bill, while they would gladly lend their aid to the improvement of a national highway like the Mississippi. For these reasons, sir, I am convinced that one committee of this House should be solely occupied with the consideration of all matters pertaining to the Mississippi River and its tributaries. The most proper committee is evidently that on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, and not the Committee on Railways and Canals.

But I am told that if a special bill is reported for the western system of waters it can never pass this House; that unless an omnibus river and harbor bill be brought forward, in which every congressional district shall have an interest, those gentlemen who fancy their localities neglected will band together and defeat a Mississippi River bill; that we can only pass such a bill by tacking on to it every stream large enough to float a scow and every harbor deep enough to afford a refuge to a mud-turtle. Sir, I have not been long a member of this House, but I have sat here long enough to feel convinced that there prevails here no such log-rolling spirit. I believe that there are in this body enough men with a statesman-like recognition of the general interests of the country to unite together and force the passage of any bill required by the growing interests of western river navigation. But, sir, even if Congress were controlled by any such petty, narrow, local selfishness as such arguments would impute to it, it becomes all the more important to separate the Mississippi system from the remaining rivers and harbors.

If internal improvements can only be carried on by a disgraceful system compounded of intimidation and bribery, who so potent to threaten and who so numerous to hold forth promises of aid as the Representatives from the great basin of the continent, where lie eighteen States, empires in themselves, with more than half of the population of the Union? If log-rolling is to rule the day, the committee that has charge of the interests of that section can put more shoulders to the work and lift a larger log than any other on this floor. No, sir, there is nothing in such an argument, there is no such wretched spirit prevalent here, and if there were it would be impotent to harm. In the remarks I have made I have no intention of reflecting in any manner upon the members of the Committee on Commerce; they are all of them men whose views are not circumscribed by the boundaries of their States. I have never approached one of them on a subject relating to western interests who has not evinced a hearty desire to advance them in every proper manner; but for the reasons I have urged above I am satisfied that by the proposed change that committee will be eased of a grievous burden and our river and harbor legislative needs facilitated. I regret that some of my colleagues from my own State, for whose judgment I have the highest regard, do not agree with me in this matter, but entertaining the convictions I do I am compelled to advocate the amendment I have offered.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CABELL. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri has presented his amendment to the substitute I have offered, because I prefer that my substitute should be adopted so as to leave to the Committee on Railways and Canals the same jurisdiction it has exercised heretofore under the rules, and that jurisdiction only. We claim no more and I ask no more. We never supposed the Committee on Commerce would desire to take from us that jurisdiction which for years we have possessed. We do not believe the Committee on Rules, when they came to consider this question, really desired to encroach upon our prerogatives and take from us any of the jurisdiction we had, but that it was an oversight on their part, when they considered this matter in connection with the duties of the Committee on Commerce, in taking so much from railways and canals and giving so much to commerce.

I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment when offered at the proper time. It may, perhaps, be appropriate that all questions relating to the improvement of the tributaries of the Mississippi should be considered by the committee having in charge matters pertaining to the improvement of that great river. I wish to throw no obstacles in the way of other gentlemen or other committees. But I am unwilling, sir, that the amendment should come in just here. I prefer to have this matter disconnected with any other and to leave the jurisdiction of the Committee on Railways and Canals as it has been for many years, and as I believe the House desires it to remain to-day.

In regard to what my colleague from Virginia [Mr. BEALE] has said when referring to the contests which have taken place between the Commerce and Railways Committees, I have only to say that my colleague seems to be very badly informed as to the state of facts in regard to which he has spoken, and has wandered very far from the true state of the case.

There have been but three or four contests between the two committees named until within a very recent period. There was a contest in the Twenty-third Congress; also a contest in the Thirty-second Congress, and perhaps one or two after that time; and up to the Thirty-eighth Congress, and in almost every instance, the vote of the House was given in favor of sustaining the claims of the Committee of Railways and Canals as against the Committee on Commerce. Yet my friend has stated that in not a solitary instance was the Railway Committee sustained. I grant that within a year or two past, and since the Committee on Commerce has assumed such large jurisdiction and acquired so much power in the House, power which enables it to do almost anything here, the decisions have been in its favor; but, to use the language of my colleague, "in not a solitary instance" was the Commerce Committee ever sustained in its contests with the Railway Committee in reference to the navigation of rivers until of late years, when it had acquired a power and influence in the House not to be resisted. But we have no conflict, sir, with the Committee on Commerce. That matter was settled some days ago by the action of the Committee of the Whole. I will say, however, that when the subject was under discussion my friend the chairman of the Commerce Committee claimed, under Rule 79 of the House, only jurisdiction of the improvement of the navigation of rivers concurrent with that possessed by the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Having obtained that jurisdiction the contest should now end and the Commerce Committee should be content to see us left in the undisturbed possession of such matters as may be properly referred to our committee in pursuance of the powers conferred by Rule 94 of the House, all of which powers we ask to be maintained through the amendment I have offered. All, I fear, that can be done now by the adoption of my amendment is to give concurrent jurisdiction with the Commerce Committee upon questions relating to the improvement of the navigation of rivers. It may perhaps be a wise thing for the House to do to have some other committee that may in emergencies go to the help of the overcrowded Committee on Commerce.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FROST. By request of several members I withdraw my amendment to the substitute, as I understand a similar amendment will be proposed when we reach section 21.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will allow me I will renew the amendment simply to say a word in response to my friend from Missouri, [Mr. FROST.] I will withdraw the amendment when I have concluded what I have to say.

The gentleman makes comparison between appropriations for Eastern States and the Mississippi Valley. When he makes that comparison as between prodigality and economy he certainly cannot make an argumentum ad hominem upon me. I have sustained here all proper appropriations for the Mississippi Valley upon the old democratic Calhoun theory that the Mississippi River, being the "Father of Waters," was almost an inland sea. I have voted for your levee system; I have voted for an appropriation for the Eads improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River. New York was never niggard toward the Mississippi Valley. I have voted against appropriations for New York, Hell Gate and all, when they were combined, as I thought, irregularly and mischievously with other appropriations never contemplated by the fathers of the democracy.

Mr. FROST. That is the reason why I wanted to divide them.

Mr. COX. The gentleman says he would like to divide them. Let him divide them. It is not a question between parsimony and prodigality. Let him meet me on the middle ground of the men who gave interpretation to this business of appropriations for rivers and harbors in a better and more honest day of the Republic.

I could refer my friend to the messages of democratic Presidents, to the old rules of interpretation, to the days of honesty in the administration of these affairs, before log-rolling became common and before men could combine for this common purpose, for all the little rivers inside of the States. Why, sir, in the old days I remember States undertaking inside of their own boundaries State improvements, slack-water navigation, dams of all kinds; canals were made and railroads, and roads of all kinds. We even gave up the old Cumberland road to the State through which it passed to get rid of this incubus of having these as Federal works.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. With pleasure.

Mr. WHITE. Does the gentleman remember that in 1832 Andrew Stewart, of Pennsylvania, got a resolution through for surveying the Monongahela River, and that in 1836 and 1837 and following years appropriations were made by the American Congress for improving the slack-water navigation of the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania? And that was in the days of democratic government.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania answer me this question? Did Andrew Stewart, the great tariff man, ever have the audacity to ask for an appropriation for the Kiskiminetas? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE. Or the Conemaugh?

Mr. WHITE. No, sir; the improving spirit of the age had not then developed the great necessities of the Kiskiminetas [laughter] as an important tributary to the Allegheny, which is a tributary to the Ohio, and thence to the Mississippi River, and consequently an important avenue for the commerce of Western Pennsylvania.

Mr. COX. And now I ask my friend, are not the Stony Creek and the Conemaugh tributary to the Kiskiminetas?

Mr. WHITE. No, sir.

Mr. COX. And is there any tributary to the Conemaugh?

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman's knowledge of geography is as antique as his constitutional policy on this subject.

Mr. COX. I decline to yield further.

Mr. WHITE. Stony Creek, I will inform the gentleman, is not on the same side of the Alleghany Mountains.

Mr. COX. Well, sir, we would never know where it was if we did not see the distinguished member here and know where he is located. Now, I have got off the line of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WHITE. For the last few years it has been impossible to locate the gentleman from New York exactly.

Mr. COX. He always comes from the people, and locates himself.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] withdraw the amendment originally offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. FROST?]

Mr. COX. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CABELL,] to substitute for the clause reported by the committee what the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

16. To the improvement of the navigation of rivers, and to railways and canals other than Pacific railroads: to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 63.

Mr. CABELL. A quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CABELL] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. SAPP. Let the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 88.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of Rule XI, and read as follows:

17. To the manufacturing industries: to the Committee on Manufactures;
18. To the mining interests: to the Committee on Mines and Mining;
19. To the public buildings and occupied or improved grounds of the United States, other than appropriations therefor: to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "other than" and insert in lieu thereof the word "including;" so that the clause will read:

"19. To the public buildings and occupied or improved grounds of the United States, including appropriations therefor: to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds."

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment by the instruction of my committee, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. We offer the amendment, as we believe, in the interest of economy and intelligent equality of expenditure.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds occupies in this House very much the same relation to an appropriation bill as does the Committee on Commerce. We must authorize the construction of new buildings from year to year. And I ask gentlemen to tell me how it is possible for us as a committee intelligently to say how many new buildings shall be authorized until we know first how much money shall be required for those in process of construction. We have before us as a committee the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, stating to us that for the current fiscal year we can probably safely expend $5,000,000 on public buildings. We cannot know how much of this the Appropriations Committee shall be induced to set apart on estimates furnished for the buildings now in progress. We never see the estimates therefor; we know nothing about the calculations made therefor; and how can we, as a committee, say that the State of Kentucky, or the State of Pennsylvania, or the State of Ohio, or the State of Mississippi, or the State of Alabama can safely come to this House and demand a new building until we know what the will of the Appropriations Committee may be with reference to the expenditure of public money in sections of our country which appeal to their generosity?

I claim that I stand here in the interest of economy, in the interest of the public weal, pleading for discretion and wisdom in the distribution of public money. And I say that there aims to be no more careful committee on this floor, and there is no more careful chairman upon this floor than the honorable chairman of this committee—no one who desires more to take responsibility upon himself, and to take it intelligently and rightly before the country, for reducing the expenditures of this Government whenever practicable.

In my judgment if we could have before us the estimates for the new as well as for the buildings in process of construction, we would be in a position to come to this House and assure the House that we do not ask the construction of a new building until we have safely compassed all the probable necessities of the Government in all the cities of this Union and in all the States of this Union.

And upon our honor as a committee we pledge to the House our resolution to report nothing unless it be within a stated limitation suggested to us by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the best interests of the Government. I trust that the Committee on Commerce, with every friend of public buildings upon this floor, will stand by this amendment offered in that spirit.

Mr. COOK. I am in favor of this amendment, for several reasons, one of which is——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COOK] proposes to speak in favor of the amendment. The rule is that five minutes' debate shall be allowed to the one proposing the amendment, and then five minutes to one opposing it.

Mr. COOK. I do not suppose there is any gentleman here who desires to speak against the amendment.

Mr. KENNA. I will take the floor in opposition to the amendment and yield my time to the gentleman.

Mr. COOK. The clause under consideration is a new provision in our rules, one not contained in the former rules of this House—a clause limiting the power and jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Why it has been put in here, unless in some way to aggrandize the Committee on Appropriations, I do not understand. So far as I know, there has been nothing in the history of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in any of its recommendations, to justify the reflection upon it that they have been either thoughtless, or careless, or prodigal and extravagant in the recommendations which they have made to this House.

Gentlemen will recollect that an honorable member of this body collected together all the bills for public buildings and grounds that had been referred to our committee, consolidated them into one bill, and then submitted a motion to suspend the rules and pass that bill. I myself, as chairman of that committee, and every other member of the committee, opposed the passage of that omnibus bill, and it was defeated. Instead of obtaining a two-third vote in its favor, there was a two-third vote against it, and that was because of the known and decided expression of opposition on the part of the members of our committee.

No public building can be constructed without an act of legislation, an act of Congress; and each bill must stand upon its own merits. This Government to-day is paying largely over one million of dollars annually for rental of buildings for post-offices and court-houses, &c., all over the country. One object which our committee has had in view is to reduce these extravagant expenditures for rentals, and to furnish the Government throughout the country with proper buildings for its purposes.

I must say that I consider this clause a reflection upon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. That committee is unlike the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Military Affairs, or any of the other committees which consider subjects connected with the regular appropriation bills. Each public building that comes up for consideration must have an act of Congress passed to authorize its construction and to appropriate money for it.

I have this further to say in opposition to the general provision in these proposed rules giving all power over appropriations to the Committee on Appropriations. Under a former rule that committee was required to report all the general appropriation bills within thirty days after the meeting of Congress. These new rules leave out that requirement, and we may be here for six months before those bills are reported.

When you ask the members of that committee why they have not reported the appropriation bills, they say that they have not had time to prepare them; that it is impossible for them to report them. More than thirty days have passed, and we have now had but one general appropriation bill reported. It is all nonsense to talk about the three or four little appropriation bills which have been passed this session. The clerk of the committee could have prepared them, if he did not, as well as the committee itself. We passed a bill appropriating $30,000,000 for pensions. The committee said that amount was necessary, and we voted it at once without looking into the matter at all.

It may be said that there has been a great deal of fault and rascality connected with the expenditure of money upon the construction of public buildings. That may be true; but neither the men who voted for the bills authorizing the construction of those buildings, nor the committee which recommended them, are responsible at all for that waste or extravagance, any more than they are responsible for the prodigality, wastefulness, and extravagance in the expenditure of other appropriations which have been made.

If this clause now under consideration shall be adopted by the House, then we might as well abolish the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for there will be no occasion for it, and give its committee-room to some other gentlemen who are now without any.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Mr. Chairman, since I have been in this House I have never seen any disposition upon the part of the Committee on Appropriations, or in the House itself, to obstruct the passage of bills which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have seen fit to recommend, or the construction of which the laws authorized. But there should be some limitation upon the enormous expenditures made in the construction of such buildings, as to the amount which shall be expended each year. While the authorizing the construction of these public buildings should properly be a matter for the consideration of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, yet the amount to be given each year for that purpose should be left to the discretion of some single head.

There is no reason that I can conceive of why an exception should be made in regard to the appropriations for public buildings different from what is done in reference to other matters of appropriations. As I do not believe that this clause will interfere in the least degree with the erection or authorization in the future of any public building which the necessities of the Government may require, I hope that the appropriations for that purpose will be allowed to remain where they are now, under the control of the Committee on Appropriations, so that each year we may know how much money is to be appropriated for the respective public buildings in course of construction.

Mr. CLYMER. I desire to submit a formal amendment to strike out the last word, in order that I may state in a general way what are my views in regard to this vexed question. Belonging to that unfortunate body of gentlemen in this House called the Committee on Appropriations, possibly I should say nothing, because they do not seem to have any rights that any one here is bound to respect. [Laughter.] Yet, sir, I cannot but feel that this committee gradually, day by day, is coming to see more clearly that the necessities of legislation, of good government, of economical government, require that the public expenditures should be reported from some one common source. I remember, sir, that in the second session of the Forty-third Congress, after there had been a majority of democrats elected to this body where so long the republican party had held sway, I had a long and earnest conversation with a gentleman, then a leading spirit on this floor; and he told me that outside of mere party considerations it was a profound satisfaction to him that there had been a change in the political control of the House. He said that during the long continuance of his party in power abuses had crept into the administration, innumerable hordes of useless officers had grown up, and that without a change of administration purification and retrenchment were impossible.

When the democracy came into power in the Forty-fourth Congress there was but one means by which this Government might be restored to something like fair, just, and economical administration, and that was by the reduction of expenditures. To reduce expenditures was impossible until we had adopted the rule upon that subject formulated by Mr. Holman, then a member of the Committee on Appropriations. This is the rule which has given us so much trouble, which has caused us so much anxiety, which I believe is the only obstacle now preventing the Committee of the Whole from agreeing with almost entire unanimity that the Committee on Appropriations should retain its old and I will say its legitimate powers.

That amendment to the rules, adopted on motion of Mr. Holman, was never intended as a means of introducing political legislation. It was designed merely to reduce expenditures; that was the object, pure and simple. If by reason of party exigency, party necessity apparently, that rule has been tortured so as to produce any other result, it is not the fault of the rule, but the practice under it. And if the minds of gentlemen of this committee can be satisfied that this rule shall be restricted to its original and beneficent purpose, we shall have no more squabbles as to whether the Committee on Appropriations should have entire charge of the appropriations for carrying on the Government. I am ready to say for myself (and I trust for most of those who act with me on this floor) that when we come to that portion of the rules I will attempt to ingraft upon it a provision which shall strip the Committee on Appropriations of the power to report new legislation, so that we shall not have power to legislate on any subject, but shall have authority alone to reduce expenditures that may be authorized by law. If we thus confine ourselves within the law it will be for the other committees of this House—the committees having charge of the Army, the Navy, Indian affairs, public buildings, commerce, &c.—to say what the law shall be; and we shall have power merely to present to the House a reduction of the amounts to be appropriated.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I would not ask the attention of the committee to-day but for the fact that an amendment offered by myself a few days ago provoked a discussion which I did not anticipate, and in which I took no part. I have listened with very much interest to what has been said by the older and more distinguished members of this House in defense of the retention of power by the Appropriations Committee, and the logic of their argument has wholly failed to satisfy my mind.

It is said, on the one hand, that the Appropriations Committee should be the mere auditing committee of the House; that measures of legislation should come from the committees to which the various subjects appropriately belong; that the Committee on Appropriations should simply report appropriations in pursuance of law; that when the Committee on Military Affairs, for instance, has fixed the number of the Army, the number and rank of the officers, the pay of private soldiers, &c., it should be the imperative duty of the Committee on Appropriations to provide the money for meeting those expenses according to the law. If that were done, let me ask, would you not simply make every committee of this House an appropriation committee, and would it not to that extent lead to extravagance? If it be important, in order that the expenses of the Government may be retrenched, that this colossal Committee on Appropriations, colossal in numbers and especially in ability, should appropriate the money, is it not equally important that the whole legislation of this House looking to the expenditure of the public money should be intrusted to this great committee of retrenchment and reform?

It is important that we have economy. But gentlemen assume that there are only fifteen economists in this House, who are to determine how many ships shall be built, who are to determine what shall be the rank and file of the Army, the pay of officers, &c.; that the remaining members of the House should commit all their duties to this one committee, who shall provide for all the machinery and expenses of the Government. It is, in my opinion, just as sensible, just as logical to say it is in the interest of economy that this committee shall do all the legislation looking to the expenditure of the public money as it is to hold that simply the matter of appropriation shall be confided to them.

I do not believe for one that this committee about which so much has been said is par excellence the committee of economy. During the Forty-fifth Congress the committee to which I now belong, and of which I was not then a member, provided for a reorganization of the military establishment by which $3,000,000 annually would have been saved to the public Treasury. Yet this Committee on Appropriations, ignoring that work in their appropriations for the Army, expended $3,000,000 of the people's money that might have been saved had the bill for the reorganization of the Army been passed.

Every member occupying a seat on this floor, responsible for his votes to his constituency, becomes an economist. If one committee is disposed to economize, the very same impulse, the same desire, the same spirit, animates them all. Gentlemen representing upon this floor other committees are just as anxious to present a good record of economy to their constituency as is the Committee on Appropriations. As I stated in the beginning of this discussion, I believe that if the appropriations were distributed to the several committees there would be in this House a race in the work of economy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the pro forma amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.]

Mr. CLYMER. I withdraw it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I renew the pro forma amendment. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to put myself in antagonism to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds any more than other members do, for there happens to be in my district and directly opposite my place of business a very important public building, which has been in course of construction for six or seven years, and which should be finished next year. I do not know that I shall be able to get the Committee on Appropriations to report the required expenditure, while I rather think I could induce the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to do so. Perhaps, therefore, I am injuring the prospect of an appropriation for that building by speaking against the amendment offered by my friend from Pennsylvania; but I think this is a matter to be decided not by temporary prejudices, by present feelings, by disappointments that we may have incurred, but upon general philosophical principles; and I do submit that the theory advanced by those who have thus far been in the majority in the Committee of the Whole is correct.

It is naturally to be expected that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, having considered the general necessities of the country and of each particular place, should bring in bills for the construction of public buildings at various points. But if, devoting themselves to this one subject, they bring in also a bill of appropriations—appropriations which they may suppose really necessary—they might, perhaps, in a given year report an expenditure of, say, $8,000,000, while eight or ten other committees, going on in the same way, would report their appropriations; so that the aggregate expenditure proposed for the year might reach $350,000,000. Now, with each committee struggling in that way for the gross amount of its appropriations, it would be very difficult indeed for each to yield what it might be necessary to yield in order to reach that balance of compromise which the interests of the Government might require to be adopted unless taxes should be increased to the extent of $100,000,000. Is it not better, then, to have one committee which, when these other committees have reported upon the necessities of various branches of the service, shall sum up all these propositions, and if it be found that the aggregate is too large shall cut down the various amounts so as to make an harmonious whole? Suppose that in a particular year the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have reported an expenditure of $8,000,000 for public buildings. Suppose the Committee on Appropriations, though glad to provide for all these buildings if it could be done, should find, upon examination of the whole field, that during the coming year there must be additional vessels built for the Navy; or suppose there should be a great military necessity—an exigency, perhaps, in our foreign affairs—so that the aggregate of appropriations must not go beyond a certain amount; in such a case the Committee on Appropriations might very well say, "This year we must cut down the appropriations for public buildings to $4,000,000; another year we may be willing to appropriate $8,000,000."

Now, taking this as an illustration, the Committee on Appropriations, the general supervising committee of amounts to be granted, would be better able to reach a harmonious balance with reference to the wants of each branch of the service than could be attained if each of the various committees should control the appropriations for its particular department. It is inevitable that a committee in charge of any subject will—I will not say unjustly magnify the importance of that subject, but will see it in all its force. I know this from my experience as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and also as a member at one time of the Committee on Banking and Currency. When I was on the Military Committee I saw, as I thought, very clearly what ought to be done in regard to the Army; and I was jealous of the Appropriations Committee for taking legislation out of our hands. There were things which we were ready and desirous to do which that committee took up and did, as I thought rashly. The work of reorganizing the Army is an appropriate duty for the Committee on Military Affairs, while the Committee on Appropriations should simply keep the aggregate of appropriations adjusted with reference to the respective needs of the various branches of the public service.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] was, I think, a little mistaken in one respect, or rather his remarks did not fully represent the case. If the Committee on Military Affairs should report legislation fixing the size of the Army, the rank and pay of its officers, and everything of that kind, there would be nevertheless something more for the Committee on Appropriations to do than merely to take a slate and figure up the expense of the military establishment as provided for by the Committee on Military Affairs. There are some large discretionary items which properly should be left to the Committee on Appropriations, which could not very well be determined upon elsewhere—large items covering transportation, subsistence, quarters, &c. A very large portion of our military appropriations, from year to year, are a matter of discretion, very properly going to the Committee on Appropriations, while the general frame-work and government of the Army could of course be determined upon reports from the Committee on Military Affairs, and ought to be determined in that way.

Mr. BRIGGS. Could not the Committee on Military Affairs exercise sound judgment as well as the Committee on Appropriations in reference to those "discretionary items," of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will say that it would be almost impossible for any committee having charge of a single Department of the Government only to take into consideration the demands of various other branches of the public service, as must be done in determining the aggregate expenditures for the year. The Committee on Military Affairs would not be able to do this because they would have investigated only one particular subject. While they might be able to arrange the general government of the Army in first-rate shape, they could not balance the various discretionary appropriations so well as one central appropriating committee.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have repeatedly heard on this floor the sentiment that it is necessary, on this matter of appropriations, to have "one head." I have heard something said about a primacy. Mr. Chairman, this is a House of Representatives, representing the American people, and I do not believe that the Representatives of the people should come here with gags in their mouths and be utterly unable to represent their constituencies upon the question of appropriations. I have voted constantly in favor of all the amendments tending to break down this autocratic power of the Appropriations Committee. "One head," sir! and that head, perhaps, not even the fifteen members of the Appropriations Committee, but the Speaker of this House, who, at the opening of the session, lays down his own private programme as to the appropriations, and these gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee merely execute his will.

Mr. Chairman, in every appropriation bill there are certain appropriations which are a matter of discretion—appropriations involving questions of policy. I take the Army appropriation bill passed at the special session, and I find that the meager and paltry appropriation made for guns for fortifications bears no earthly relation to the necessities of the military service of this country. The Military Committee ought to have the power to say—and to say it by reporting a bill at any time—that the military service of the country requires $1,000,000 to be expended in the making of guns adequate to the defense of our coast. Yet that committee has not the power to do so; if they undertake it they must report a bill which will go to the table, and there lie perhaps until the expiration of the session.

Take the Committee on Naval Affairs of which I have some knowledge. We want to report, perhaps, that there shall be no more wooden ships built, that the time has come for us to begin to build iron ships. Yet before we can be heard the Appropriations Committee has thrown into the House a bill which embodies simply the recommendation of the head of a bureau, a bill in which they make appropriations for not one pound of iron for iron ships, but only for timber to rot in our docks. The Committee on Naval Affairs would like to introduce into this House some policy; we would like to have something to say on the appropriations necessary to carry out that policy; but it is utterly useless, it is a waste of time for us to attempt any thing of that kind, if we have no power to be heard upon the measures we may present.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] has made the only advance toward a proposition which I should like to see adopted. He certainly is fair. He is the only man from the Appropriations Committee who has manifested the least disposition to take their hands off the legislation of this country. But he does not go far enough. He does not recognize the necessity we are under of making the appropriations conform to our idea as to the policy of the Government in any certain branch. Take the bill which is now lying on the Calendar, lately reported unanimously by the Naval Committee, in which we seek to establish a policy. We did not even dare to put into that bill an appropriation of a single dollar. It is there with a blank space left to be filled hereafter. I do not think the Committee on Naval Affairs or the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are any less capable or any less honest than the Committee on Appropriations. I do not believe they are more extravagant. I believe they are as patriotic, as honest, and as intelligent as the average of members of the Committee on Appropriations.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to strike out the last word; and I promise the committee, Mr. Chairman, this is the "last shot in my locker" during this debate. We have rallied—I say "we," I mean the minority of this committee have rallied—on nineteen points in this contest, and have been defeated each time, except when we were led by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN,] the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, or who ought to be, [laughter,] and my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Now, these two points gained have not yet accomplished what was desired by the "plebeians" of this House—we of the minority; for I never saw a fight organized nor have I ever read in history of a conflict carried on by petty kings which was managed more adroitly than the fight on this floor. There were two conflicting ideas; one was there should be a great central head to all appropriations, and the other was that we were all alike on this floor—in plain English, that one man was as good as another.

Mr. CLYMER. If not better.

Mr. CALKINS. If not better, as my friend suggests. [Laughter.] The committee has determined by several separate votes that they need somebody to stand over them to guide them. I think if we are beaten this time we can fall back to another point and take the last stand, and that is on the ground proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.] While I assure you if you press a vote on this point I will co-operate with you and vote for the proposition that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shall have the power which they ask, yet if beaten I think it best not to waste time by further resisting the continued action of the committee.

Let us get along with these rules. Let us make a stand on the proposition made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] and let us from that extract a few crumbs of comfort.

Mr. WEAVER. Does the gentleman surrender?

Mr. CALKINS. No, sir; I do not surrender anything. The fiat has gone forth several times from this committee of no change; and you know, Brother WEAVER, you like fiat. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman is not far now from the kingdom. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to say one other word, and that is this, and I wish to address it to my friend from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] the leaders of the republican host. It must have been an unequal contest from the first when these gentlemen were all leading in the same direction with the Speaker of this House. It became unequal, although many gentlemen on the other side came to our support, I am glad to say; and yet, sir, the contest was unequal from the beginning. And why? There is no committee which will not fight to maintain the prestige and power it already has. I am glad to say the gentleman from Ohio has won his spurs not because of any rule of this House—it requires something else besides a rule of the House and self-imposed restriction to make leaders—it requires brains. And no gentleman can ever sail into the presidential chair by self-imposed restrictions or the rules of the House, and I beg some gentlemen here to recollect it.

Mr. CLYMER. That is not the way you make them.

Mr. CALKINS. No, Brother CLYMER, with your help, we make them eight to seven.

A MEMBER. By fraud.

Mr. CALKINS. Leadership challenges to combat all opponents in this arena, and does not seek power by reason of rules. It is a contest of moral forces, one where reason and logic should prevail, and not that of autocratic power.

I wish to say another thing, Mr. Chairman. If this committee determines to keep the power in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations of making all disbursements and standing as the great auditing committee of the House and of the country, let us accept the situation and try to strip them of the power to put general legislation upon appropriation bills; let us rally on that point, and let us see whether we cannot choke from them, if you please, that power, and then we shall have gained so much at least.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Chairman, the whole theory of this debate has been, if I understand it, on the part of those who advocate giving to the Appropriations Committee all the power demanded by them, which is practically the complete control of the purse-strings, that the other committees cannot be trusted with the great interests of this country, but that we must have one head, one arbiter, to say how much shall be expended in this direction and how much shall be expended in that direction and how much in the other direction. The gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] a member of the Appropriations Committee, takes this ground and advocates it because he says it will be more economical. The cry of economy is a relief. We have heard for so many years of "honest money" under guise of which the people have been sacrificed to that Moloch of American monopolies the national banks. Now the cry is "economy," under which it is proposed to sacrifice nearly all the representatives of the people on this floor, by granting the control of the purse of the nation to one committee and practically to one man. Their whole theory is directly antagonistic to every principle of republicanism: that this House is not the arbiter of these questions, that this House is not the body to which these various committees appeal to decide whether this or that amount should be appropriated, and that the great Committee on Appropriations is to relieve them of all responsibility and settle all these questions entirely for the Representatives upon this floor, rushing their forty or fifty or one hundred million dollar appropriation bills through in the last hours of a session under the five or one minute rule, and under the excitement of party prejudice, with nine-tenths of the members of this House as ignorant as so many mules of the merits or demerits of the bills, as was done last spring, and may always be done by this committee. I repudiate that theory. I despise it. It is as anti-republican as negro slavery.

I advocate a distribution of this great power among the various committees, whose duties require them to learn the necessities of various Departments of this Government, and who therefore know ten times as much about those needs as any one committee can. I advocate it also because it is giving the greatest responsibilities of this Government to the many rather than to the few. Why, sir, you have disfranchised two hundred thousand people in the District of Columbia. They have no more rights as American citizens than so many cattle. Now you propose to come into this House and adopt rules that will virtually disfranchise over nine-tenths of the representatives of the people under the deceptive cry of "economy." That is the simple proposition we have before us. I stand by the Representatives of every section of this country. I have the honor to represent as many people upon this floor as the gentleman from Connecticut, and I want to know why my committee should not have as much right to say what amount of money should be appropriated in the direction in which they have investigated public affairs as any other committee upon this floor. I insist that when any committee brings in their verdict this House of Representatives is the body to decide whether the amount recommended is too large or too small, and I believe that any committee of this House is worthy to be trusted to do that much, to report their conclusions for the action of this body, and if I am wrong, if it be the duty of this House to surrender to one committee the virtual control of the most important legislation of this body, then our whole theory of a republican form of government is a sham and a failure. I insist that you cannot long maintain a republic in the land with the heart of the government itself a pure despotism, a "one-head" power, as advocated to-day by one member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I renew it. And, Mr. Chairman, I wish only to say a word or two on the pending amendment. I have listened with some surprise, sir, to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] who has just addressed the committee, as well as to several other gentlemen who have preceded him. I had supposed the Committees of this House were the servants of the House, and that the House, and not the committees, legislated. I had supposed it was the Committee on Appropriations, or the Committee on Military Affairs, which reported a bill here, and that, when reported, that bill was, from the time it was reported until it was passed or rejected, under the control of a majority of the House. But, judging from the way in which the gentleman from Indiana has talked, one would suppose that the majority of this House could not do what it pleased, and that it had no absolute power over propositions brought in from any committee. If he has any ambition for a committee which shall have jurisdiction enabling it to legislate, then I hope his desire will not be gratified.

Mr. DUNNELL. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. DUNNELL. A law of Congress says that the Auditors of this Government shall receive a salary of $4,000 a year; the Committee on Appropriations bring in a bill saying that they shall only receive $3,600. I want to know whether the whole House is not at the mercy of that committee with that report before it?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not at all, sir.

Mr. DUNNELL. Not at all. Why?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Because the majority of this House at any time can take that bill from the Committee on Appropriations, amend it, and make it comply with existing law.

Mr. DUNNELL. But the committee has for years appropriated but $3,600, when the law says these auditors shall have $4,000.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then why does not the gentleman rise in his place and offer an amendment?

Mr. DUNNELL. If I did it would be ruled out of order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not at all, sir, for the amendment would be in pursuance of existing law, and therefore in order. All the gentleman has to do when the committee brings in the bill will be to rise and move to increase the appropriation so as to make it conform to existing law, and if he can get a majority of the House to stand at his back, of course his amendment will be adopted.

Mr. Chairman, the majority legislates here and always has legislated.

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman says the majority legislates and controls the business of this House; then why, in the name of Heaven, cannot the majority control a report from the Naval Committee, or Military Committee, or any other committee, as well as a report from the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly the majority can control that report, but I have no time to call the gentleman's attention to the answer given by the gentleman from Connecticut to the importance of some committee doing the auditing in the first instance for the consideration of the House.

I wish to say an additional word. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] said the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] was the only gentleman belonging to the Committee on Appropriations who had advocated the striking off the objectionable clauses from the twenty-first rule as reported in the codification. I take leave to differ from him. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] advocated it; the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] advocated it; I had the honor myself to advocate it as best I could in a twenty-minute talk during the general debate. But I stand here and now as I have stood for years ready to resist at every point I can under the rules the giving of legislative power to the Appropriations Committee, and to amend the rules so as to take from the hands of any committee which reports the appropriations the power of reporting legislation changing existing law along with the appropriation to buy its way through the House and the Senate. When that fight comes I will be as ready as any gentleman to take part in it by voice and vote.

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BLACKBURN. It seems to me far more good will result from voting than from discussion. I move, therefore, that the committee rise for the purpose of obtaining an order from the House to close debate upon this paragraph. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] If the committee is willing to vote I will not make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER.]

Mr. GARFIELD. We may as well have tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLACKBURN and Mr. SHALLENBERGER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 81.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I give notice that I will call for the yeas and nays in the House on that amendment.

Mr. CONGER. That is what we want.

The Clerk resumed the reading of Rule XI, and read as follows:

20. To the railroads and telegraphic lines between the Mississippi River and the Pacific coast: to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

21.
to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River.

Mr. CHALMERS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

In clause 21, fill the blank by inserting as follows:
"To the improvement of the Mississippi and its tributaries, and all surveys and estimates relating thereto."

Mr. CHALMERS. I discussed this proposition quite fully when we were under the rule allowing general debate, and I do not care, therefore, to trespass now upon the time of the committee.

Up to this time, Mr. Chairman, the contest has been against the report of the Committee on Rules and against the Committee on Appropriations. The proposition which is now introduced from the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River does not antagonize in any way the report made by the Committee on Rules. That committee left a blank to be filled as to the jurisdiction of this committee, and expressed no opinion as to what was best to be done on this subject.

If those gentlemen who have been up to this time fighting against the Committee on Commerce, upon the ground that it has been extravagant and that its bill is usually an omnibus bill—if they are in earnest and desire to see every appropriation made for the improvement of rivers and harbors closely criticised and examined by the Committee of the Whole House, they should come to the support of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, and enable us to adopt this amendment. For, sir, this will bring every appropriation for the Mississippi River and its tributaries before the whole House to be considered, and there can be no complaint then that a river appropriation has been passed under a suspension of the rules by a two-thirds majority.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. That can be done.

Mr. CHALMERS. That I have no objection to myself, but there are many who do object. I say to those gentlemen, if you are in earnest, and if you desire to see these matters fairly and fully criticised in Committee of the Whole, you should sustain this proposition.

And the proposition should be sustained for another cause. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] who always speaks plainly and to the point, said in his remarks that this House was under a master; that that master was the Committee on Appropriations. He said he would as soon see a ship go out to sea with two masters as to see the Committee on Appropriations divided. But, sir, we have now more than one master. We have not only the Committee on Appropriations to rule over us, but we have the Committee on Commerce also.

After the declaration of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CABELL] that he would consent to the adoption of this amendment at the proper time, I voted for his amendment to give jurisdiction over river appropriations to the Committee on Railways and Canals. There was a specific rule of this House, long since adopted, giving that committee jurisdiction over this subject. There never was any rule giving this jurisdiction to the Committee on Commerce. It is a usurpation on its part, a usurpation which has grown up by long practice, I admit, but nevertheless a usurpation on its part. And while the Committee on Commerce have so usurped this power they have spent millions and millions of dollars upon other rivers and other harbors, while these great navigable waters, which are recognized to be proper subjects for improvement by the whole people of the United States—the Mississippi and its tributaries, which water over twenty States of this Union—have been comparatively neglected. We ask you to place this great interest in the hands of a committee friendly to it, that we may be enabled to improve those waters as they demand and deserve to be improved.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] said we have been defeated in this fight against centralization of power in one committee because the great leaders on his side of the House had deserted him. We have been defeated on this side also because some of our great leaders have, as I understand it, deserted us in this fight. Shortly after the election of Speaker this fight commenced. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] commenced the struggle. It was his resolution that proposed to take away the power of the Committee on Appropriations and divide it up among other committees. But when the hour of battle came I looked in vain for the white plume of that gallant knight, that I had been accustomed to follow upon many a field.

At the same time my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] introduced an amendment proposing that there should be a special committee to consider these questions and to make rules, as I understood it, for the purpose of carrying out the idea of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] I may have done him injustice; I may have misunderstood his position at the time; but I thought he was then with us. We looked in vain, however, for his help when we were fighting the Committee on Appropriations. Unfortunately that gentleman had been captured by the enemy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to call the attention of this committee to the fact that this amendment involves simply and solely the question whether it is the policy of this country to improve its navigable waters by appropriations from the Federal Treasury. Of course, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] does not have it in mind at this time to defeat such appropriations, because he doubtless feels a common sympathy with the people along the Mississippi River and its tributaries in the improvement of all the navigable waters of the United States.

I wish, however, to call the attention of members now to this matter, so that if they sustain this amendment, and it shall turn out that by so doing they have defeated appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of any of the rivers of this country, they cannot say that they were not warned of what they were doing. If you divide, as this amendment proposes to divide, the business of appropriating money for the improvement of the navigable waters of the United States so that appropriations for the Mississippi River and its tributaries, making nearly one-half of the navigable waters of the country, shall be under the charge of one committee, and appropriations for the improvement of the Atlantic, the lakes, the Gulf, and the Pacific waters shall be under the charge of another committee, it is not at all probable that you can ever pass a bill reported from either committee through this House. Who supposes that a bill proposing to appropriate money for the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, excluding appropriations for the improvement of the other public waters of the United States, could receive the sanction of a majority of this House? Who supposes that a bill reported by the Committee on Commerce for the improvement of the waters of the Atlantic, the lakes, the Gulf, and the Pacific, and leaving out the improvement of the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries, could receive the support of a majority of this House? Not only would every local interest concerned be arrayed against it, but we would have, as we now have, as we ever have had, and as we are likely to ever have, a class of gentlemen opposed to this kind of appropriation, a class of gentlemen reverently in love with the old system of Conestoga wagons, with a tar-bucket and a dog under each wagon, like the gentleman from New York, who sighs for the days of dirt-roads and common wagons, and looks with horror on all steamboats and railroads. Gentlemen, you may go back with the gentleman from New York to your road wagons and to your railroads also, for they have become established; but by this proposition you will fail to do anything for the improvement of the water navigation of this country. I have no doubt this amendment will receive his earnest and hearty support, as well as that of every member of this House who is determinedly opposed to the improvement of the navigable waters of the United States.

My friend from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] cannot help, and it seems that no man upon that committee or upon the Committee on Roads and Canals can help, joining the Committee on Appropriations in making flings at the Committee on Commerce. Well, sir, so far we have had reason to rest content with the solid judgment of this House, looking to the promotion of the welfare of this country, with its commerce of thousands of millions annually, the cheapening of the transportation of that commerce, and the reducing of the rates of insurance. We are well content with the exhibition that has been made here of broad statesmanship which comprehends the entire continent and all its interests. We have evidence of an intention on the part of a majority of this House not to abandon the idea that we represent fifty millions of people, a mighty empire or territory so situated that the cotton of one region, the grain of another, the minerals of another must be transported from one section of the country to another. The nature of the commerce of our country requires that a vast amount of transportation shall take place, and the only check upon the extravagant cost of land transportation is the hope of improving the thirty thousand miles of navigable waters of this country in the interest and for the benefit of the producers of the country, as well as of the consumers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I simply desire to state to the Committee of the Whole House how it was that this blank appears here in clause 21 of Rule XI. The Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, at the time these rules were framed, had no duty defined at all under the existing rules. It was not a standing Committee of this House until during the last session of Congress, when it was so made. It is not enumerated in the Manual at all among the Committees of the House.

When the Committee on Rules came to this Rule XI, they found themselves unable to agree as to what should constitute the scope, power, and duties to be imposed upon the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River.

I will not stop now, because it would require too much time, to answer every fling which every member sees fit to make in regard to the Committee on Rules and the Committee on Appropriations. The concluding remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] amount to nothing so far as I am concerned, except to prove that he was the victim of a crude conclusion that had no warrant at all in fact. At the time to which he refers I was, as I am now, in favor of the amendment which he has proposed. I believe that it was the duty of the House, and one which we could not well get around, to fill this blank in some wise.

You have created this committee and made it a standing committee of this House. You have assigned it no duty; you have given it no power; you have required of it no service. You must put something here in the rules in regard to that matter. I was from the first and I am still in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] which gives to the Committee on the Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River absolute charge of the subject of the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

It is indeed, sir, a work vast enough in its volume and importance to engage the whole attention of any one committee of this House. I will not be driven from that position. I favor it now. I never was committed, as the gentleman may have considered me, to a general disintegration of the legislation of Congress. I never offered any amendment, as he says he construed it, upholding and supporting the view that he happens to hold. I have said, and I say again, (I hope I shall not find it necessary to repeat it a third or a fourth time,) that I was perfectly willing from the first to take all these appropriation bills away from the Committee on Appropriations and give them to the committees having charge of the respective subjects, provided the House would exercise some degree of caution and put some limitation upon the aggregate amount that was to be appropriated.

I did offer a resolution by way of amendment at the beginning of this Congress, looking not to the distribution of appropriation bills, but to the raising of a select committee of five, whose duty should be to revise, condense, and simplify the whole system of rules by which this House has been governed—that and nothing more. I have not changed my position upon that general proposition, nor upon the question now under consideration, one iota. I believe that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi ought to be adopted. I believe that the work it will impose upon that committee is of such proportion and magnitude as to commend itself to the soundest judgment and best discretion of this House. I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FRYE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire simply to add, though it may not be necessary, that in what I have said upon this amendment I do not speak for the Committee on Rules, but for myself.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the gentleman this question, whether he is in favor of providing that the committee now under consideration shall report, like the Committee on Commerce, directly to the House instead of reporting to the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I answer the gentleman very frankly that I would put that limitation upon this amendment, if it shall indeed prevail.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, I am ready to admit at any time that the majority of the House is generally right. I have little confidence in my own judgment when I find the majority—at any rate on my own side—voting against me. But I would fail in my duty if I did not call the attention of the House, and especially of my side of the House, to some facts upon this question. There have been a dozen, or possibly twenty, amendments proposed to the report of the Committee on Rules, a large majority of which have failed. Then there came a pretty earnest contest as to whether the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and the Committee on Naval Affairs should have a right to report appropriation bills relating to their respective subjects. The majority of this House said "no," that this business should remain in the hands of the Appropriations Committee. Why? Because economy requires that it should be there. But the Committee on Rules reported a provision that the Committee on Commerce, having in its hands one of the largest appropriation bills, should make its report to the Committee on Appropriations; and the spectacle was exhibited here of a majority of two-thirds declaring that this bill should be reported by the Committee on Commerce directly to the House at any time. Why? If the Committee on Military Affairs is to be compelled by a majority vote of this House to allow the Committee on Appropriations to report the appropriations for the Army, why is the Committee on Commerce by a two-thirds vote allowed to make its report directly to the House, and thus have an opportunity to suspend the rules and put the bill on its passage without any examination or discussion whatsoever? There is some reason for it.

Then we come to the next committee which was able to carry an amendment through this House. What was it? The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. They make a proposition that they may be permitted to report directly to this House, and it is carried by a majority of a dozen or fifteen. Why?

Mr. BARBER. Because we had them. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. That is it exactly. And it is only offering another opportunity for scandal to be thrown upon the Congress of the United States. How is it so many men are willing that these two committees—one having in charge rivers and harbors, the other the public buildings in our respective districts—shall have the advantage of every other committee of this House? How is it that the advantage thus given to these committees is refused to the other committees?

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question? He has referred once before to the "scandal" brought upon this House by the Committee on Commerce. Will he be frank enough to mention one fact upon which that "scandal" was based? Was it based on anything except the wild declamation of members on this floor, in violation of truth?

Mr. FRYE. "Only this, and nothing more," that the river and harbor bill is the only appropriation bill brought before this House to be passed under a suspension of the rules and without debate.

Mr. REAGAN. Oh, no. At the last session we passed another appropriation bill under a suspension of the rules—a bill appropriating $24,000,000 or more; and the gentleman supported that bill. Has there been any "scandal" about that?

Mr. FRYE. Every year for the last five years, until it has become the custom, the motion has been made to suspend the rules and pass the river and harbor bill; and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce knows the reason to be that there are so many gentlemen in this House interested in the passage of the bill that the requisite number of votes can be had.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it "scandal" to pass any bill in conformity with the rules, when those rules require a two-third vote?

Mr. FRYE. Now, Mr. Chairman, one word further. Here comes another committee—the Committee on Mississippi Levees, and, as the amendment proposes, the tributaries of the Mississippi River. The proposition is to take one-half of all the internal improvements of this country and let this committee report upon them. Now, this proposition will pass.

A MEMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. FRYE. Why not? I assume that it will. You will then have two committees reporting river and harbor improvements; two committees can manage them infinitely better than one! Each committee can move to suspend the rules and pass its bill—first the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, then the Committee on Commerce, then the Committee on Mississippi Levees. Day after day you will come in here with your bills making large appropriations of money; you will suspend the rules, and pass them. If you take this away from the Committee on Appropriations, take everything away from them. Let the rest of these committees stand upon the same basis on which these three committees stand.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Committee on Commerce is now charged with the improvement of the branches of the Mississippi River, and the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi with that of the main stream. I submit to gentlemen in the matter of internal improvements those two subjects form but one. Any experienced engineer will, I think, tell you so, and that you cannot have two systems, one for the improvement of the main stream and another for the improvement of its branches. It is absolutely necessary the same authority should control the improvement of the waters of the whole Mississippi Valley.

This appears to me to be too evident to require argument; but there is one important fact I will state in that connection. One of the best engineers, whose opinion has been published in regard to the manner of improving the Mississippi River, proposes to do it by using the current of the stream. Unless those who operate in that way have also the control of the waters of the branches of the Mississippi, the engineer who may be engaged in improving the main stream may cause a bar to form in the mouth of every tributary, for in removing a bar which is above the Arkansas, for instance, by the current of the Mississippi he may remove that bar into the mouth of the Arkansas River. And so of any other river. That of itself to me is a conclusive argument why the amendment proposed by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] should be adopted, uniting those two subjects, as they should be, under one authority.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reply to some remarks which have just fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Texas, chairman of the Committee on Commerce. He stated to this House that the members of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River had thrown every obstacle in the way of the Committee on Commerce in carrying out the object of that committee in passing river and harbor appropriation bills reported from that committee. In other words, sir, he made the assertion that the members of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi had thrown obstructions in the way of the Committee on Commerce in executing the policy of that committee in improving the rivers and harbors of this country. Now, as far as I am concerned I deny the statement. I deny, sir, that I have ever opposed the Committee on Commerce in carrying out its policy whenever, in my judgment, that committee reported a bill which I could conscientiously vote for.

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of the policy of improving the rivers and harbors of the country. In doing so I subscribe to the doctrine of the old democratic party of opposition to any general system of internal improvements. That doctrine grew out, as is well known by gentlemen, of the question of building post-roads and carrying out every sort of local internal improvements in the country, to be paid for by direct appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States. But it is quite a different proposition to improve the navigable streams of the country. It is quite a different thing to appropriate for the improvement of navigable rivers and harbors. Consequently I have always been in favor of the policy of improving the rivers and harbors of the country, and have cheerfully voted for all bills for that purpose reported to this House when, after examination of the items, I have been satisfied the appropriations were to be applied really to the improvement of navigable streams. It is, in my judgment, within the legitimate province of the Government to make appropriations for such purpose and to continue to make them hereafter, as they have been made from the very beginning of the Government.

The gentleman states further that by dividing the jurisdiction, particularly in reference to the improvement of rivers and harbors, we thereby jeopardize the passage of any bill which may be brought before the House for such improvements, and, therefore, experience has shown the absolute necessity of bringing in an omnibus bill combining all interests throughout the country and putting it upon its passage under a suspension of the rules, without amendment and without debate. That of itself at once shows such a system would be nothing more than log-rolling. I am opposed to any such system of making appropriations in this House. I am opposed on general principle to bringing any bill before the House which cannot stand upon its own merits and bear discussion.

We say that if the jurisdiction is extended to our committee which it should have it will then give to us the control of a general system of improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries. As has been stated very correctly by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] the committee having jurisdiction over the main stream of the river should also have jurisdiction over the improvement of its tributaries, because any general system of improvement which may be adopted after investigation, should go not only to the river itself but to all its tributaries.

And why, sir, cannot such a bill as that be passed? We have already passed a law which was not included in any river and harbor appropriation, but passed independently after discussion in this House, appropriating or binding the Government of the United States to pay some $5,500,000 for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River. I refer to the appropriation to carry into effect the contract with Captain James B. Eads to deepen the South Pass of the Mississippi River, which has already borne such important fruits. That bill was thoroughly discussed. It was before the House and it passed upon its merits.

Now, sir, I object to the practice which has been pursued in reference to these river and harbor bills, on estimates or without estimates of the engineers, making appropriations of money here and there for the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries. What good has been done? What advantage has the navigation of the Mississippi River reaped from general appropriations, scattered as they have been from bar to bar and from point to point without any uniform plan, with no general system? What advantage has it been to the improvement of the river? None whatever. It is necessary, if any advantage is to accrue, we should adopt a general system for the improvement of the river and its tributaries.

Besides, sir, our committee has already exercised appropriate jurisdiction over the Mississippi River, and has reported a bill to this House, which has become a law, by which a commission has been established to make the estimates and bring in a report to Congress in reference to a general system of improvement for this river from its headwaters to the head of the passes at its mouth.
